Mr. McNAMARA. Mr. President, what I have stated is why our debate today is recognized all over the country as being aimed at two goals. One of these goals is the establishment of real democracy in the U.S. Senate. That goal is to bring an end to an intolerable situation where the filibuster and, more often, the threat of a filibuster, can exercise a governing hand over legislation in this body.

We all know that it is not the actual use of the filibuster that exercises its destructive influence. It is the mere threat that a filibuster will be launched which has far too often kept the great Senate of the United States on its knees.

The second goal of our efforts today, of course, is the further enactment of civil rights legislation—legislation which can be considered in this body on its merits, not dragged down by the destructive hand of the filibuster.

The people of the United States should not have to wait another 84 years for civil rights legislation.

The people of the United States need civil rights legislation far more meaningful than the weak-kneed version we passed in 1957.

We in the Senate who believe that such legislation should be permitted to come before us for consideration should not have to drag it through an "iron curtain" with rule XIV or fight off threats of filibusters under the present rule XXII.

As we were about to pass the Civil Rights Act in August 1957, I noted on the floor that opponents of the moderate bill we had begun with had won their real victory the previous January.

I said they had won their major victory on January 4, 1957, when the Senate voted 55 to 38 against adopting new rules, including a more equitable rule XXII.

That set the stage for debate on the Civil Rights Act which did not begin until the following July.

Despite the valiant effort made by many Members of this body to make that bill meaningful legislation, the real battle already had been lost at the time the Senate refused to topple King Filibuster.

We have already lost our fight to establish the constitutional right of the Senate to adopt its rules, but we have the opportunity to change the undemocratic rule XXII.

If we now refuse to budge that monster off his throne, Mr. President, we may well be writing the defeat of any worthwhile civil rights legislation during the 86th Congress.

That thought will hardly panic some members of this body who want no implementation of the constitutional rights of every American citizen.

It should disturb those who, outside this Chamber, champion civil rights legislation but who refuse to vote here to make it possible.

I am a Democrat, Mr. President, and proud of it.

The platform of the Democratic Party states that the party is committed to "support and advance the individual rights and liberties of all Americans."

Quite a number of Members of this body campaigned on that platform.

They supported it, and they accepted the support of the Democratic Party.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that it is time that Members who used the Democratic Party to win the votes of the people should now show a little reciprocation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Michigan has expired.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois will state it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. May I ask how much time has been taken by the proponents of the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proponents of the amendment have 34 minutes remaining.

Mr. DOUGLAS. How much time has been taken by the opponents?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The opponents have 46 minutes remaining.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The opponents?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The opponents.

Mr. DOUGLAS. How much time do the opponents have remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-six minutes.

Mr. DOUGLAS. In other words, they have taken 14 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They have taken 14 minutes on the amendment, plus some time on other matters.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I hope that later in the morning the opponents will show their hand and begin to discuss the measure.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield to me?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield to the Senator from Texas with the understanding that I do not lose my right on the floor, and that the time does not come out of my time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I ask unanimous consent that the time I take be charged to the time under my control.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I suggest that the Senator from Illinois read his remarks of last week when he was informing the majority leader about how he should establish his case on Senate Resolution 5. If he does so, I am sure he will want to follow his own advice. I should not want to advise the Senator from Illinois, even though the Senator from Texas received much advice on how to establish his case. I have no request for time. If I had a request for time I would be glad to yield it.

We are not trying to conceal our hand. We are prepared to show it and to vote immediately. I do not wish to incur the wrath of any of our colleagues, or to justify the charge that we are trying to prolong debate or to educate the people unnecessarily. Most of the Members have already made up their minds. Some of them have made up their minds in favor of it. I believe they have some reservation, but, notwithstanding, they will vote for the amendment. I believe a substantial number of Senators who have gone into the matter thoroughly are prepared to vote against it. In any event, there is no Senator on either side of the aisle at this time who is asking for any time to argue with the Senator from Illinois. If there is, I shall be very glad to yield time to him.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I should like to make a friendly suggestion, which I hope the majority leader will be inclined to adopt. Of course, it is entirely up to him whether he will do so. If he does not wish to, I shall be content with his decision. I should like to suggest that we have a live quorum call, with the time consumed by it charged to neither side, and if, after a quorum has been established, no Senator desires to be heard, that we proceed immediately to vote. On the other hand, when a quorum has been established, a Senator may wish to speak.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I would have no objection whatever to that procedure being followed. I believe every Senator knows how he is going to vote. I do not believe it is possible to make any Member of the Senate listen to another Senator. I have found that to be true. When I have started to talk, on some occasions, I have found that many of my delightful friends already had all the information they needed on the subject which I was discussing.

Mr. CLARK. I may say that the Senator from Texas is not alone in that regard.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to suggest the absence of a quorum, and that 10 minutes of my time may be used for that purpose, in accordance with the very friendly suggestion of my good friend, the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I wonder if the Senator would be kind enough to yield a half minute to me.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to my friend from New Mexico such time as he may desire.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, the oldest newspaper in the West is the Santa Fe New Mexican. It is now published and edited by Mr. Robert McKinney, formerly an efficient and intelligent member of the International Atomic Energy Agency.

Recently he wrote an editorial on the efforts being made to amend Senate rules, especially rule XXII. I ask unanimous consent to have the editorial inserted in the body of the RECORD following my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

One of the U.S. Senate's first orders of business will be to decide whether to amend its rules—and, specifically, rule XXII, which governs requirements for limiting debate.

Unfortunately, many of us lose sight of the extreme importance of the prompt and sound resolution of this question, because we see it only as a tactical maneuver forerunning a showdown on civil rights legislation.

It is true, of course, that there is danger, under rule XXII in its present form, that the North versus South struggle over school integration could grow into a long battle of attrition between immoderates on both sides, destroying chances for effective congressional action on a mass of other important legislation during this critical year when we are on the defensive not only on the earth but in infinite space.

The so-called filibuster issue is at heart the question of how to modernize the machinery of legislation without taking the governor off the steam engine—without destroying the historic safeguard of minorities against sometimes fleeting and often impulsive majorities.

Traditionally, the Senate has been the open forum of the world's most successful republic—the Chamber where the American philosophies of government were fully, carefully weighed. Six-year terms and the designation of only a third of the Senators in any one election are provided in our Constitution, not through chance, but to give this deliberative body insulation from the whims and tides tossing on the surface of that sea of people which the 175 million of us make up.

So it's easy to understand why moderates supporting the proposed cloture amendment have been careful not to go too far—not to destroy the last defensive beachhead of minorities, within the battle and also above it.

For tomorrow's "burning issues" are bound to be different. The West may find itself defending a minority position on public lands; the Senator from Illinois and his neighbors may be battling the majority on inland waterways. The day could soon come when those now most anxious to cut off debate could find themselves in desperate need of the traditional open forum to stave off legislation they know to be unwise.

There have been times when unlimited debate has proved immensely valuable. As Senator CARL HAYDEN, of Arizona, points out, New Mexico and Arizona would have been a single State these past 46 years had not a handful of far-sighted and determined Senators maintained by filibuster that their minority view was the proper one, insisted on admission of each Territory under its own constitution, and finally won over the majority after long debate.

We believe that the present rule, which requires the assent of two-thirds of the total membership of the Senate to limit debate, has been outdated and should be revised.

We agree with those backing an amendment to rule XXII to permit cloture by a vote of two-thirds of those present and voting.

While the amendment would not abolish the filibuster, it would mean that an effective segment of the Senate would have to hold the minority view or a filibuster could be broken with relative ease.

We hope the moderate Senators representing the Western States will assert their leadership and bring an immediate vote—rejecting the Douglas proposal to apply cloture by a simple majority and adopting the compromise amendment—without allowing the situation to develop into the spectacle of a filibuster on the filibuster rule.

This newspaper supports LYNDON JOHNSON and the other statesmen of the center who are willing to face up to the civil rights issue, are purposed to modernize the Senate machinery without changing its character, and are determined to get down to the mass of other important business on which our world position demands action.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, in accordance with the unanimous consent given me by the Senate, in response to the suggestion of my friend, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK], I now suggest the absence of a quorum. I ask the aides of the Senate to notify all absent Senators that the roll will be called. As I understand, 10 minutes have been yielded for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas is yielded 10 minutes for that purpose.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER] is absent because of illness.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I announce that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT] are absent on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A quorum is present.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I yield 10 minutes to the very able senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. CASE].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey is recognized for 10 minutes. The Senate will be in order. Time will be charged to neither side until the Senate is in order.

The Senator from New Jersey may proceed.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. President, for the last few weeks there has been a widespread attempt to make it appear that the proposal offered by the distinguished majority leader offers a reasonable position midway between two extremes.

This is simply not so.

As has been pointed out, for all practical purposes the proposal of the distinguished Senator from Texas would leave the situation unchanged. So far as the third section is concerned, his proposal might well worsen the plight in which the Senate now finds itself.

The Johnson resolution proposes a return to the 1917 rule, insofar as a majority is concerned, which prevailed until 1949. Since 1917, there have been 22 votes on motions to impose cloture. Of those 22 votes, only 4 have been successful. Merely changing the requirement for a constitutional two-thirds to two-thirds of those present and voting would have had no effect on the historical results in those 22 cases. Only 4 attempts at cloture would have won, as 4 did win.

By requiring a constitutional majority, a significant difference would have occurred. Nine attempts would have been successful. The fact is that any issue which becomes the subject of a filibuster will compel a full attendance when and if a vote is reached.

The Douglas proposal, which I and other Senators support, is in fact a moderate one. It will permit the Senate effectively to stop filibusters, but only after several weeks have elapsed. In actual practice, I am sure, a minimum of from 6 to 8 weeks of debate would be assured. Only then could a constitutional majority of the Senate—that is, 50 votes of a total of 98—reach a vote.

That such a modest proposal should invoke the extremist label is hard to believe. Yet it has been alleged that, the advanced liberals—earnest men but in some cases inflamed by their long frustration in seeking full civil rights for Negroes—would fundamentally alter the Senate as an institution.

We are told that our proposed new rule might result in a profound change in what for nearly two centuries has been our most changeless institution, the United States Senate, and would end the Senate as a unique deliberative body.

We are accused of regarding conduct described as respect for constitutional tradition as reactionary hostility to civil rights.

Yet the same writer has elsewhere characterized the Senate as "to a most peculiar degree, a southern institution—the South's unending revenge upon the North for Gettysburg."

No, Mr. President; the Senate has not been our most nearly changeless institution. Constitutional tradition, such as there is of it, bearing on the rules issue, is on our side, and not on the side of reactionary hostility to civil rights.

The Senate has undergone radical changes from time to time, and the stultifying veto by filibuster is a comparatively modern curse unknown to the early Senate. The early Senate—at least down to the Civil War—under its rules, precedents, and customs, had the authority to control debate effectively, and, for the most part, did stop incipient filibusters by insisting that Senators confine their speeches to the question before the House, and that Senators so conduct themselves as to comport with the traditional dignity of the Senate.

This history has laid to rest forever the myth that in the sessions of the Senate prior to the Civil War, a Senator could speak impertinently, superfluously, or tediously, without let or hindrance, in violation of Jefferson's Manual. The period when the Senate was rendered impotent for days and weeks at a time by the unseemingly spectacle of Senators taking turns in speaking impertinently, superfluously, and tediously, not merely to delay, but to prevent, the Senate's acting, is of modern development, finding no sanction or support in early Senate history or practice.

To illustrate my point, I cite the fact that under the rules governing successive Senates down to 1828, the Vice President had complete authority to rule on matters of order and decorum in debate, and from his decision there was no appeal. Can one imagine John Adams, Thomas Jefferson, or Aaron Burr tolerating a filibuster? They did not. Nor did John Gaillard, the revered Senator from South Carolina, who presided over the Senate as President pro tempore for many years after Burr. With rare exceptions, the great tradition they set held through the years down to the Civil War.

Our proposal that a majority of the entire membership of the next Senate—that is, 50 of the 98 Senators—must favor cloture to impose it has been described in the press as a barest and slimmest majority. This is indeed misleading.

As you know, Mr. President, the term "majority" as used in the working of our proposal, has a restricted or special meaning given to it by the words "entire membership of the Senate." The words are, "a majority of the entire membership of the Senate"—what has come to be known as a constitutional majority.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CARLSON in the chair). The time of the Senator from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I yield 5 more minutes to the Senator from New Jersey.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey is recognized for 5 additional minutes.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. I thank the Senator.

Under article I, section 5, of the United States Constitution, a majority of each House constitutes a quorum to do business. While the Constitution does not explicitly state the number of affirmative senatorial votes generally needed to pass a measure in either House—and neither do the standing Senate rules—it has always been agreed that, save for the several exceptions specifically mentioned in the Constitution, a majority of a quorum, which has come to be known as a simple majority, could pass measures. No one has ever disagreed with this proposition. In the case of the current Senate, this means that, generally speaking, a majority of a quorum—26 Senators—can by voting affirmatively, enact legislation.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, the Senator from New Jersey is making a very able speech. I wonder if we might have order in the Chamber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

The Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. A "simple majority" is quite different from a "constitutional majority." Usually when the term "majority" is used without further qualification, the person using it means a simple majority. Thus, when the adjectives "barest" and "slimmest" are used to describe a minimal Senate majority, the writer properly can have reference to no more than 26 Senators—not the 50 required by our modest proposal.

It has also been pointed out frequently that the Senate was deliberately designed as a frank check on unqualified majority rule. Certainly the Senate was frankly designed to act as a check on the kind of majority rule which would have resulted if the General Government had consisted of only one House, or even two Houses, the Members of which were apportioned among the States solely on the basis of population. The small—by population—States wanted protection from complete domination by the large States, and secured it by the great compromise, under which the Senate was to consist of two Senators from each State. So far as population is concerned, this was a frank nonmajority provision. But in 1789 nobody dreamed of providing that the Senate itself was to act as a parliamentary body other than on the basis of simple majority rule, except in the specific situations set forth in the Constitution, such as the two-thirds vote required in passing vetoed bills, and in proposing constitutional amendment to the States, and except for the proviso that a majority of the whole body is necessary to constitute a quorum to do business.

To read into the checks against total majority rule of the people of the Nation taken as a whole, the notion that the Senate itself is to act on some basis other than simple majority rule finds no warrant in history.

Surely, no one will deny that the Constitution requires only a simple majority of Senators—26 could do it—voting for a bill to pass it; nor will anyone deny that the Senate has now, and has always had, majority rule in voting on legislation. Under the Constitution it is perfectly clear that even a simple majority of Senators—even 26—could close debate if the Senate made such a rule. I submit that our proposal, which would require at least 50 Senators voting for cloture, is most modest and reasonable.

We do not mean to change the constitutional structure; we mean to implement it. And if the objection is to majority rule in the Senate, why not say so and let us debate the wisdom of a constitutional amendment?

Let us not hide behind the free debate myth if we want to have a further check on majority rule in Senate proceedings. Let us openly espouse Calhoun's theory of concurrent majorities, and openly provide that no bill shall pass unless two-thirds of those present vote affirmatively.

Finally, we are charged with blaming the filibuster for inability to enact civil rights legislation. We do, indeed. We know from bitter experience the difficulties and frustrations inherent in securing legislation to assure their constitutional rights to a minority. True, we finally achieved passage of a Civil Rights Act—of a sort—last year—the first such legislation in nearly 75 years. But we are still far from assuring effective protection of the constitutional rights of all our citizens.

This is the real heart of the objection to our proposal, and the objection that has been made to similar proposals in the Senate, and it goes back to a time long before I was a Member of this great body.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, will the Senator yield me some time?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I yield 4 minutes to the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CASE].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota is recognized for 4 minutes.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, the history of man's struggle for liberty and freedom has been the story of his attempts to place limits upon unbridled power. It has been the story of man's attempt to make it possible for him to speak freely.

Whether the Magna Carta, our own Constitution, or the Bill of Rights, every one of them has been an attempt to place a bridle upon dictatorial power or the power of majorities to impose their will upon minorities without a hearing.

Every fight for liberty has been a fight to make it possible for the little man, or the minority, to have a voice and have a chance to be heard. In that way, ideas are tested on the anvil of debate. Debate is the means whereby truth and wisdom can be found.

The distinguished Senator from New Jersey has said that in the early history of the Senate filibusters were avoided as rules then confined debate to the matter before the House. That observation should point the true path we should pursue if we want to get away from dilatory or delaying debate. We should have a rule of germaneness. I have an amendment which I shall later present on that subject. But to propose that the right of any State to be heard through this Senate should be subject to gag rule to be imposed by simple majority strikes at the very center of freedom and liberty which the Senate should preserve.

The distinguished Senator from Illinois, if any Member of this body, should realize the value of having full and open debate, for certainly he and I know that 2 years ago, or was it 3 years ago—time passes so rapidly—had a simple majority been permitted to impose a gag rule on Senators, when there was a discussion of a certain bill on the floor of the Senate, the laws of this country today might have been different than they are.

As some of the ablest Senators who have served in this body have pointed out, legislation, if good, comes back. Smith W. Brookhart, who was a Progressive Senator from the State of Iowa, pointed out in debate on the floor, back in the 1920's:

> The rule sometimes delays good legislation, but never kills it. Good legislation always comes back, and finally wins. The rule kills a great deal of bad legislation. That class of legislation which cannot stand the light of publicity will always be killed by unlimited debate.

The immediate question before the Senate relates to the question of the majority which may cut off debate.

Article V of the Constitution specifically provides that "no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate." It provides that "no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate." It is here proposed that a simple majority may effectively stop the voice of States, by placing a gag rule upon their Senators.

Should we have a simple majority, or should we have something more than a simple majority if we are going to place a gag upon the voices of States in the Senate?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I would yield if I had more time, but I have only been allotted 4 minutes.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I yield 1 minute of our time to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I will be glad to yield if I can get the time reinstated.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator has been arguing as though we were proposing a simple majority vote. Is the Senator aware that what we are proposing is a so-called constitutional majority of the entire membership of the Senate? Furthermore, this limitation could not be imposed until 15 days after the presentation of a petition, and the petition would not be presented until the debate had gone on for a long time. Thereafter, even after cloture imposition, each Senator would be entitled to speak for 1 hour.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President——

Mr. DOUGLAS. Is the Senator aware of those facts, and that this procedure can be followed not merely on the motion itself but on the motion to take up, so that we could have from six to eight weeks of debate? The Senator is a fair-minded man, and I am sure he would not make the statement which he has made if he knew what the proposal is which is now before this body.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I am glad to have the Senator from Illinois clarify that point. Mr. President, am I reimbursed for the time taken by the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am glad to yield the Senator the time necessary to reply to the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has yielded 1 minute.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am glad to yield an additional minute to the Senator from South Dakota.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is recognized for an additional minute.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. My response to the question, Mr. President, is that in every instance in which the Constitution deals with a situation which the Constitutional Fathers thought should require more than a simple majority of those present, two-thirds was the rule which was suggested in the Constitution.

This is not true merely on the matter of overriding a veto, but it is true in at least eight cases. The Constitution or the amendments thereto provide in at least eight cases for a two-thirds majority.

Impeachment convictions require the concurrence of two-thirds of the Members present.

Expulsion of a Member requires the concurrence of a two-thirds majority.

Overriding a veto requires approval by two-thirds of the Members.

A similar provision requiring a two-thirds vote of Senators is provided on certain other orders and resolutions.

Amendments to the Constitution may be presented by two-thirds of both Houses, when they deem it necessary.

Ratification of treaties requires the vote of two-thirds of the Senators present.

In the instance when the election of the Vice President should fall to the Senate, again the Constitution provides for a two-thirds vote.

On the removal of a disability for membership in the Congress, when caused by having been involved in an insurrection, a two-thirds vote is required.

So, there are at least eight instances of such requirements. In every instance where the Constitution deals with something more than a majority vote, there is a provision for a two-thirds vote. Why, then, when we are considering a proposal which would put a gag upon the right of Senators to speak and might deprive some States of their right to voice opinions on the floor of the Senate, why should we adopt anything other than a two-thirds requirement as set forth in the Constitution in all the instances I have related?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may have printed in the RECORD at this point a statement in support of the constitutional provisions on majorities.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS ON MAJORITIES

1. No impeachment without two-thirds of the Members present. Articel I, section 3, reads (clause 6):

"The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments. When sitting for that purpose, they shall be on oath or affirmation. When the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside: And no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the Members present."

2. Expulsion of a Member requires two-thirds majority. Article I, section 5, clause 2, reads:

"Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its Members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a Member."

3. Overriding veto: Article I, section 7, clause 2, reads:

"If after such reconsideration two-thirds of that House shall agree to pass the bill, it shall be sent, together with the objections, to the other House, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered, and if approved by two-thirds of that House, it shall become a law."

A similar provision is found in the succeeding clause, which reads:

"Every order, resolution, or vote to which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary (except on a question of adjournment) shall be presented to the President of the United States; and before the same shall take effect, shall be approved by him, or being disapproved by him, shall be repassed by two-thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives, according to the rules and limitations prescribed in the case of a bill."

4. Amendments to the Constitution itself rest upon a proposal by "two-thirds of both Houses." Article V reads:

"The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, or, on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which, in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, or by conventions in three-fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress: Provided, That no amendment which may be made prior to the year 1808 shall in any manner affect the first and fourth clauses in the ninth section of the first article; and that no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate."

That last phrase might be noted in passing—namely, that no State without its consent shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate. Any proposal to limit debate involves depriving some States of their voice, albeit not their suffrage. Respecting the thought guards the suffrage of the States in the Senate, and certainly suggests restraint in depriving a State of the presentation of its views in the Senate. This is an aspect of the matter which those who would limit debate by simple majority vote might well consider.

5. Again, the Constitution, in article II, section 2, requires concurrence of two-thirds of the Senators present for the ratification of treaties. Clause 2 of section 2 reads:

"He shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur.

6. Again, where election of Vice President falls to the Senate, through failure of the electoral college to cast a majority, the Constitution, both in the original article II and in amendment 12, relies upon a two-thirds rule. The applicable clause in amendment 12 reads:

"The person having the greatest number of votes as Vice President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed, and if no person have a majority, then from the two highest numbers on the list, the Senate shall choose the Vice President; a quorum for the purpose shall consist of two-thirds of the whole number of Senators, and a majority of the whole number shall be necessary to a choice."

7. Again, removal of a disability for membership in the Congress, when caused by having been involved in an insurrection, may be removed by a two-thirds vote of each House.

Thus, it would seem that the Founding Fathers sought to protect the rights of minorities by requiring more than simple majorities to override or silence them in matters of great moment.

And it scarcely need be said that the maintenance of this principle requires the availability of such a rule for every instance in which a minority might think that its rights were imperiled by the suppression of speech.

Mr. MONRONEY. Does the Senator desire more time? I am prepared to yield the Senator 2 additional minutes.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I should appreciate having a little more time.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, I yield 2 additional minutes to the Senator from South Dakota.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota is recognized for 2 additional minutes.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I think in a time such as this we could well heed the words of some people whose position at least ought to be regarded as objective. I was impressed by the words from Woodrow Wilson's respected work on "Constitutional Government," which read:

The talk on the part of Congress which we sometimes justly condemn is the profitless squabble of words over frivolous bills or selfish party issues. It would be hard to conceive of there being too much talk about the practical concerns and processes of government. Such talk it is which, when earnestly and purposefully conducted, clears the public mind and shapes the demands of public opinion.

Walter Lippmann, who certainly ought not to be regarded or charged with being anything but objective in his approach to a matter such as this, said in his column on the 6th of January 1959:

> The other consideration which moves us is that we do not wish to entrust the civil liberties of all our people, not only under the 14th and 15th amendments but under the whole Bill of Rights, to simple and narrow majorities. We live in a time of danger when panic is always possible and panics can easily produce a stampede away from liberty.

Mr. President, it is because of consideration of that principle enunciated by Mr. Lippmann, and it is because of the fact that the whole history of liberty has been a struggle to make it possible for minorities to speak, that I shall vote against the pending motion and other motions of that character.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, if the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. MONRONEY] will permit, I should like to yield time to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT]. I yield as much time as the Senator may need.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas is recognized.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I have no desire at all to delay the business of the Senate by speaking at any great length on the pending resolution. Not only is it imperative that we move on to the consideration of the urgent problems confronting us, but we are all aware that the question before us is not a new one and I doubt if there is any facet of this problem which has not been thoroughly considered. It has been the subject of debate by learned men throughout the history of the Senate.

I have had the privilege, during my tenure in the Senate, of participating in what I consider to be historical debates on the question of limitation of debate in this body. Nevertheless, I again feel it an obligation and, indeed, a solemn duty briefly to restate the views I have expressed in the past. I recall the long hours devoted to the discussion of this issue when Senate rule XXII was amended in 1949. It was during the course of that debate that I inserted into the RECORD portions of an article by one of the most profound thinkers and certainly one of the most widely respected news commentators of our time, Mr. Walter Lippmann.

In that article, Mr. Lippmann so concisely stated the real essence of the problem which is before us today that I should like, for the benefit of Members who have come to this body since that time, and also for the purpose of again calling it to the attention of those who participated in the debate in 1949, to read the most significant parts of it as a preface to my brief remarks. The article began:

> Although the question before the Senate is whether to amend the rules, the issue is not one of parliamentary procedure. It is whether there shall be a profound and far-reaching constitutional change in the character of the American Government.

It went on to state that if the proposal to amend the Senate rules is successful—

> The existing power of a minority of the States to stop legislation will have been abolished * * * for the real issue is whether any majority, even a two-thirds majority, shall now assume the power to override the opposition of a large minority of the States.
> In the American system of government the right of democratic decision has never been identified with majority rule as such. The genius of the American system, unique I believe among the democracies of the world, is that it limits all power—including the power of the majority. Absolute power, whether in a king, a president, a legislative majority, a popular majority, is alien to the American idea of democratic decision.
> The American idea of a democratic decision has always been that important minorities must not be coerced. When there is strong opposition, it is neither wise nor practical to force a decision. It is necessary and it is better to postpone the decision—to respect the opposition and then to accept the burden of trying to persuade it.
> For a decision which has to be enforced against the determined opposition of large communities and regions of the country will, as Americans have long realized, almost never produce the results it is supposed to produce. The opposition and the resistance having been overridden, will not disappear. They will merely find some other way of avoiding, evading, obstructing, or nullifying the decision.
> For that reason it is a cardinal principle of the American democracy that great decisions on issues that men regard as vital shall not be taken by vote of the majority until the consent of the minority has been obtained. Where the consent of the minority has been lacking, as for example in the case of the prohibition amendment, the democratic decision has produced hypocrisy and lawlessness.
> This is the issue in the Senate. It is not whether there shall be unlimited debates. The right of unlimited debates is merely a device, rather an awkward and tiresome device, to prevent large and determined communities from being coerced.
> The issue is whether the fundamental principle of American democratic decision—that strong minorities must be persuaded and not coerced—shall be altered radically, not by constitutional amendment but by a subtle change in the rules of the Senate.
> For if that principle is abandoned, then the great limitations on the absolutism and the tyranny of transient majorities will be gone, and the path will be much more open than it now is to the demagogic dictator who, having aroused a mob, destroys the liberties of the people.

Mr. President, I submit that, in this article written almost 10 years ago, the very essence of this problem was condensed and stated in as concise a form as possible.

I believe, and have often said in the course of Senate debates involving this question, that one of the most significant aspects of our form of government is that we have devised a means whereby the individuality and the rights of each of the States in the Federal system is, to some extent, preserved and respected. The institution within our system which is, more than any other, responsible for the preservation of the rights of the individual States is the upper House of our Congress.

The Senate of the United States is unique among parliamentary bodies. It has no counterpart in any legislative body and it has become renowned as the greatest deliberative body in the world. It has a distinct and essential function in maintaining the delicate system of checks and balances so vital to the proper operation of the governmental system devised by the great and wise men who founded this Nation.

That the Senate functions in the manner it does and occupies the position it does in our system—that it has become such a great deliberative body is because of the existence of the tradition of free and, in a sense, unlimited debate.

Further abridgment of the freedom of debate in the Senate, in my view, can lead ultimately to abridgment of the freedoms of the people of this Nation. One need not be a world historian, a political scientist, or a Member of Congress to know that history is replete with examples of nations and peoples whose freedoms have been obliterated through ruthless assumption of absolute power by tyrants. In every such case the right of free speech, freedom of open public debate, was the first of the freedoms abolished. For when this right exists, where the voices of freely elected representatives of the people are not stilled, the rights of the people are not likely to be usurped by depots.

So long as each of the States of this Union is equally represented in the Senate of the United States, and so long as each State's elected representatives in that body have the right to freedom of expression—freedom from coercion—and are free to express their views as representatives of their States without fear of being smothered, stifled, or gagged, so long will the rights of the citizens of each of the States be protected.

One of the greatest Senate liberals of all times, the elder Senator La Follette, in discussing limitation of debate in the Senate had this to say:

> Believing that I stand for democracy, for the liberties of the people of this country, for the perpetuation of our free institutions, I shall stand while I am a Member of this body against any cloture—that denies free and unlimited debate. Sir, the moment that the majority imposes the restrictions imposed in the pending rule, that moment you will have dealt a blow to liberty, you will have broken down one of the greatest weapons against wrong and oppression that the Members of this body possess.

Those advocates of so-called majority rule in the Senate of the United States could well profit by considering these words spoken by Senator La Follette. They should ponder on exactly what unlimited majority rule can mean. The mere fact that a majority advocates a certain course of action has never been a guarantee of the right or the wisdom of the act.

We know that the greatest crimes in history have been committed by unchecked majorities. It was a rabid and inflamed majority that demanded of Pilate the crucifixion of Christ, though there was a significant minority who insisted he be freed.

History tells us that Roman majorities were entertained in the arenas by the spectacle of lions tearing the early Christians to shreds.

Majorities demanded of Martin Luther on pain of death that he recant the truths proclaimed in his 95 theses nailed to the church door at Wittenburg.

And it was a majority who willingly surrendered its freedom to the madman

Hitler and pleaded ignorance of the inhuman practices instituted by its leaders.

Martyrs throughout history have been consumed at the stakes by the flames kindled by passionate majorities.

So, to me there has never been anything sacrosanct in the theory of rule by the majority nor have I ever been able to equate the majority rule theory with the concept of democracy. Rather, one of the chief characteristics of a democratic society is the safeguards it provides to insure protection of the rights of minorities from the ruthless exercise of power by popular or transient majorities.

I do not believe that it was ever intended by the framers of our Constitution that unlimited majority rule should be its guiding principle. Rather, I believe that they intended to devise a system which would curb the absolute rule of the majority. Surely this is one of the things meant by Madison or Hamilton in a significant section of "The Federalist Papers:"

> The necessity of a Senate is not less indicated by the propensity of all single and numerous assemblies, to yield to the impulse of sudden and violent passions, and to be seduced by factious leaders into intemperate and pernicious resolutions.

Certainly the Founding Fathers did not endorse the simple majority rule theory when they determined the manner in which the Constitution was to be adopted nor when they provided for the manner in which that document could be changed by amendment. It is required that three-fourths of all the States ratify changes in the Constitution—not a simple majority of the States. The Constitution is full of denials of the principle of simple majority rule. Treaties cannot be ratified by a simple majority, nor can impeachments or expulsions of Members of Congress be decided in that manner. Presidential vetoes must be overridden by two-thirds of the Members of both of the Houses of Congress. All these, I submit, are examples of the denial of rule by a simple majority.

To sum up, it is my belief, one which has become more firm with the passage of time, that minorities have rights which should not be trampled upon with impunity by any group which happens to be a majority at any given time.

One of the great authors of the country, Mr. Herbert Agar, in his book, "The Price of Union," summarized the basic issue involved in this controversy. He said:

> If the majority demands its way too harshly, the Federal principle is broken, for the essence of federalism is the power of regional minorities to protect their interests.

The Senate of the United States, and that which distinguishes it, the right of free and extensive debate, is a cornerstone of our democratic form of government.

I, as a representative—in effect, as an ambassador of my State in the Congress—have a duty to protect the rights of the people of Arkansas, and so long as I represent my State in the Senate, I shall oppose with all the vigor I possess any measure designed to dilute the right of the Members of this body to debate freely the issues brought before us.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, I yield 7 minutes to the distinguished junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. CHURCH].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho is recognized for 7 minutes.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, first I wish to commend the distinguished Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CASE] for the remarks he has made, particularly with reference to the profound quotation of Woodrow Wilson.

I should like, Mr. President, to express my views on the pending amendment in the nature of a substitute to the so-called Johnson resolution. I do so, Mr. President, in full knowledge of the fact that my views are not of any great moment to the Senate. I have not been a Senator of the United States long. I have neither the seasoning nor the seniority to speak with authority on Senate procedures. Nevertheless, I feel constrained to make my views clear, if only because they require me to oppose a proposal which is sponsored by four Senators whom I esteem so highly.

Mr. President, the issue before us is not majority rule. That should be clear enough by now. The rules of the Senate of the United States provide for majority rule both with respect to substance and procedure, except in those few cases in which the Constitution of the United States expressly requires a two-thirds vote. Can there be any doubt that every bill which comes before this body is adopted, or rejected, or amended by action of the majority? This is true with respect to substantive matters, but it is equally true with respect to procedural matters, because under the rules of the Senate a majority retains the power to accept, to reject, or otherwise to modify any rule which governs us.

Mr. President, the real issue we confront is simply stated in this way: What rule shall the majority of this Senate adopt with reference to imposing a limit on debate as to all matters, substantive and procedural, which are to come before us? It has been argued, in the course of the past several days, that debate in the Senate of the United States ought not to be permitted under any rule which would allow a handful of determined men to prevent the Senate from voting on the matter at hand. Mr. President, I agree. For that reason, I think that subsection 3 of rule XXII as presently constituted, which would permit a small handful of Senators, by the device of unending debate, to prevent the great majority of this body from acting—since that portion of the rule allows no cloture at all if the matter before the Senate relates to a change in the rules—should be stricken. I remind the Senate that the Johnson resolution would strike subsection 3 from rule XXII and impose the same rule of cloture with respect to procedural matters as it would impose with respect to substantive matters.

But, Mr. President, I equally cannot agree with those who say that we should adopt such a rule for the Senate as would permit a group consisting of one more than half of our Members to terminate debate.

I oppose such a proposal because, essentially, if we adopt it in the coming vote, it means that by our act we shall have accepted the principle of majority cloture. I submit that a healthy respect for the rights of the minority in connection with all the issues to come before the Senate requires that we refuse to adopt or confirm the principle of majority cloture.

I know it has been said that ample debate would be permitted under the proposal now before us. It has been said that the debate might last 15 days, and some additional days besides. It has been said that on occasion the debate might last as long as 30 days.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Or 8 or 9 weeks.

Mr. CHURCH. Or, under optimum conditions, even as long as 8 or 9 weeks.

I know that no rule propounded by the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], the distinguished Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS], or the distinguished Senator from New Jersey [Mr. CASE] would be an unreasonable rule. The point I wish to make is that the question is not whether a reasonable time for debate would be allowed under the proposal now pending. If, through the acceptance of the pending proposal, we adopt the principle of majority cloture, however reasonable the time allowed may now be, once the principle of majority cloture has been adopted, the cause celebre next year or the year after will be to reduce the time limit from 15, to 7, or 3 days. Once we embark on that course, there is no assurance whatever that the limits imposed upon debate will not become more and more restrictive, until at last we shall have made of the Senate another House of Representatives. Could liberals chart a course more strange?

It has been by our refusal to adopt the principle of majority cloture that we have set apart the Senate of the United States from the host of legislatures that exist elsewhere. It is the principle of majority cloture that underlies every gag rule that muffles other legislatures. The Senate of the United States has become the most important deliberative body in the world because it has steadfastly refused to adopt the principle of majority cloture, and has repeatedly guaranteed the right of extended debate. In this fact alone are we to be distinguished from other parliaments, elsewhere in the States and in the world at large.

It is said that we must adopt this proposal because of the transient interests of a single cause, namely, civil rights. I am for civil rights legislation; and let me give notice here and now that I will support with all my conviction and with all the power at my command the inclusion of part 3—previously stricken from the civil rights bill of 1957—under the procedural safeguards now contained in that bill. I pledge my support to that effort.

I am also very much interested, as many Members of this body know, in statehood for Hawaii. Statehood will be more difficult to attain without majority cloture, but, Mr. President, some things are worth doing the hard way. If in the process there is required a little give and take; if the process requires some element of accommodation, remember that most historians will bear me out when I say that this process has served the country well, and we have benefited more from it than we have suffered.

These are the reasons why, as we consider all the questions which come before us, and decide upon the rule to govern us in connection with all of them, we should adhere to the well-established tradition of the Senate that has made it great.

The Johnson proposal involves a return to the rule of 1917, that two-thirds of the Senators present and voting may invoke cloture. I favor that proposal, because the present rule is too harsh.

The Johnson proposal would apply the same rule in a case in which the question before the Senate related to a change in the rules. I favor that proposal, because it is fitting, and in accord with the constitutional mandate. But let us vote down the present proposal. I say that in the furtherance of no ambition save that of preserving inviolate the prerogative which has made of this body the greatest deliberative parliament in the world.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the acting majority leader yield me 1 minute?

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield 1 minute to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. HOLLAND. I rise to express my very great appreciation and to voice the warmest of compliments for the position taken by the Senator from Idaho, and his eloquence in taking that position.

I am sure that most of us, in passing through Statuary Hall, have noted that the State of Idaho has one representative there, in the form of a statue of a distinguished predecessor of the Senator who has just spoken. I refer to the late Senator Borah.

In a study of the questions involved in the current debate, I have noted with appreciation over and over again that the position taken by the late distinguished Senator Borah of Idaho is identical with that which has just been voiced so eloquently by his successor, the present junior Senator from Idaho. I compliment and congratulate him for following so ably in the distinguished footsteps of his great predecessor.

Also I wish to voice my approval of the statement recently made by our distinguished colleague the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CASE], and for his labor in compiling for the RECORD a list of the several instances in which constitutionally the Senate is committed to following the two-thirds rule.

For the purpose of voicing my compliments and also, if possible, strengthening that position, I invite attention to the fact that, although there is no rule on the subject, the position taken by the Senate time and time again, even in overruling a hostile ruling of a Presiding Officer, has been that, by a two-thirds vote of the Senate, the rules of the Senate may be suspended from time to time, and the Senate may take action which is not in accord with the rules, thus adopting and following the precedent and course of action so ably pointed out by the Senator from South Dakota, and which appears so many times in the Constitution itself.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I appreciate very much the remarks the Senator has made, and particularly his comments regarding the two-thirds rule. In that connection, I also point out that in the House of Representatives a motion to suspend the rules always requires a two-thirds vote.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I shall be glad to yield a little later. I agreed earlier to yield to the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] for the purpose of making a statement.

THE SITUATION IN CUBA

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I should like to speak to the Senate for 2 minutes as chairman of the Subcommittee on Latin American Affairs of the Committee on Foreign Relations. I make these comments not merely because I happen to be opposed to capital punishment, not merely because I believe that the taking of human life is a decision for the Almighty and should never be the decision of man, but I make them because I am horror stricken by the new blood bath in Cuba.

There is great concern in our country at this hour over the blood bath which seems to be taking place in Cuba. I have long been a friend of freedom in Cuba. A few days ago I urged the recognition by the United States of the new Cuban Government. The RECORD shows that I have spoken out time and time again against the Fascist policies of Batista and have pointed out that there really is no difference, so far as human liberty is concerned, between the police state of fascism and the police state of communism.

In view of the events being reported to us almost hourly as to what is occurring in Cuba at the present time, I rise on the floor of the U.S. Senate to give this word of warning to the officials of the new Cuban Government. Killing their opponents is not the way for the leaders of the new regime in Cuba to win the support of free men and women around the world. I would give them the advice that it would be better to withhold their executions and to use their prisons for fair penal treatment until emotions calm down. Executions of Batista leaders and followers should be based at least upon public trials at which evidence can be presented and law and order can prevail. I am opposed on moral grounds to the law of the jungle which is all capital punishment amounts to. But in this instance the executions are not based upon a public trial and a public record. Vengeance seems to be the order of the day in Cuba.

As chairman of the subcommittee I deplore—as I happen to know others in this country are deploring at this hour—what appears to be the adoption on the part of the new regime of one of the techniques of the old police state—"Kill your enemies." It is not humane. It is not in keeping with the democratic processes of self-government. It is dictatorial. It is the old police state tactic of killing those who disagree. It is not Christian. It is not the way to build up good will among free men and women around the world.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution (S. Res. 5) proposing to amend Senate rules XXII and XXXII.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. How much time remains on each side on the pending amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois has 20 minutes remaining, and the Senator from Texas has 8 minutes.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the very able junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. CARROLL].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, as a new Member of the Senate, I have thoroughly enjoyed the able debate conducted by both sides on this vital issue. and have especially been interested in reading the report of the Committee on Rules and Administration. We have had before us the excellent report of the committee—principally authored by the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS] on one side, and by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. TALMADGE] on the other. Also, we have had splendid debates outlining in great detail the history and the precedents connected with the issue before us. Needless to say I have been greatly impressed.

However, it seems to me that in the debates most of the arguments have been made in a vacuum.

Actually, we are not confronted with a theory, but with a condition. The condition today is that the Johnson resolution gives the shadow of a change, but not the substance of a change. To me that is the basic point we should consider.

What brings this important issue before us today? Every Member of the Senate knows that there is urgent need for a change in rule XXII, based upon the unfortunate unconstitutional action taken by a majority of the Senate in 1949. It is this imperative need for a change which creates the controversy today. The proposal offered by the distinguished Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON] in his resolution appears to make such a change. In my opinion it will bring about a change only of one or two votes so far as the 1949 rule is concerned.

I have read very carefully the message on the state of the Union delivered by the President of the United States, in which he outlined the problems which lie ahead. In the field of science, in the field of medicine, and in almost every other field, except in the field of political science, we are moving ahead. In that field are we afraid to change? Are we afraid to experiment? If so, what is the reason for our timidity, for our fear?

If under the Constitution a majority of the Senate can effectuate a change, as we propose to do by the Douglas amendment, why cannot majorities in succeeding Congresses also make a change if our judgment today is in error? I agree with the distinguished Senator from Idaho that it is always possible to make an unwise change. However, a majority in a succeeding Congress can always correct the error if necessary.

We hear a great deal of criticism of the proposal to limit debate by a constitutional majority, which I believe the American people favor. In the debate on Friday, I heard the statement that 26 votes, that is, a majority of a bare quorum, could constitute a majority. It could in pure theory, but it is not the type of majority about which we are talking and I think we ought to lay away that ghost once and for all. We are talking about a constitutional majority of 50 Senators. When Hawaii becomes a State, it will be 51 Senators.

We hear much to the effect that two-thirds of the Senators present and voting, or as few as 34 Members, could theoretically close off debate, and that is pointed to as a danger implicit in this rule proposal. We hear much about a proposal of three-fifths, or 30 Members being able to limit debate.

However, actually, the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] and his colleagues is, in my opinion, a very moderate one. It is a sensible one. It meets all the needs of the time and the demands of the Nation. It would mean action by 50 Senators, probably after 8 or 9 weeks of debate, as the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE] has said in his fine speech, with all the checks and balances involved in a resolution going through a committee before it comes to the floor of the Senate. It must first meet the test imposed by committee consideration, coupled with all the other checks and balances which exist in the Senate and in the rules.

Therefore, I say that the argument in favor of a constitutional majority is very clear. Such a proposal has all the safeguards we need.

Recurring to the question of civil rights, it is too bad that the opposition party does not pay more attention to the President. What the President said is very important, and it has had a great deal to do with influencing my judgment as to whether debate should be closed by a constitutional majority or three-fifths or two-thirds. I quote from the President:

> The government of a free people has no purpose more noble than to work for the maximum realization of equality of opportunity and the law.

Under the Johnson proposal there would be extremely limited opportunity to work for that equality of opportunity.

I continue to quote from the President:

> That is the concept under which our founding papers were written. This is not the sole responsibility of any one branch of our Government. The judicial arm, which has the ultimate authority for interpreting the Constitution, has held that certain State laws and practices discriminate upon racial grounds and are unconstitutional. Whenever the supremacy of the Constitution of the United States is challenged I shall continue to take every proper action necessary to uphold it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CARLSON in the chair). The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield 3 more minutes to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. CARROLL. I continue to read from the President's state-of-the-Union address:

> One of the fundamental concepts of our constitutional system is that it guarantees to every individual, regardless of race, religion, or national origin, the equal protection of the laws. Those of us who are privileged to hold public office have a solemn obligation to make meaningful this inspiring objective.

I say that unless we adopt the Douglas proposal, there will be little opportunity to make meaningful the objective of the constitutional system as described by the President. As the Senator from Illinois has so clearly pointed out, under the present system, it takes 64 votes to close debate. Under the Johnson proposal, it would probably take 62 or 63 votes. That is why I emphasize that the Johnson proposal is merely a shadow change, but no material change in substance.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, how much time do we have remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRUENING in the chair). The Senator from Illinois has 12 minutes remaining. The Senator from Texas has 8 minutes remaining.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I should like to ask the distinguished minority leader, my colleague from Illinois, who is in charge of the time in opposition to the bill itself, if he would yield us a half hour on the bill for debate on the pending amendment.

Mr. DIRKSEN. May I ask whether the Senator has some speakers who will take time now?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I certainly would not wish to be arbitrary about it. I shall be glad to give the time to my colleague from Illinois.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I thank the Senator. I yield 15 minutes to the senior Senator from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, we have had a great deal of debate on the subject of a change in the rules. There has been referred to constantly the fact that we have had a report from the Committee on Rules and Administration. I had the honor to have had a hand in drafting the report, following hearings held by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. TALMADGE], and myself, as a two-man subcommittee.

Therefore what is very important to emphasize, I believe, at the very outset in the argument on the subject is that the proposal which is now before the Senate by way of an amendment to the pending measure is not the proposal of the Senator from Illinois and his colleagues. It is the proposal of the majority of the Committee on Rules and Administration. Let us understand that. It is the proposal of the majority of the Committee on Rules and Administration, by a vote of 5 to 4. The following Senators signed the majority report. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS], the Senator from Rhole Island [Mr. GREEN], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. CASE], and I. The Senator from New Jersey and I are supposed to be marshaling the forces on this side of the aisle in favor of this position. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN], and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER] are not committed in the Senate to a particular position in terms of fighting for this particular plan. However, they are reasonable and dispassionate Senators, who have heard evidence and have read the record of our hearings, and have heard, I assure the Senate, very full discussion of the pros and cons on this subject in the Committee on Rules and Administration. They have come forward with the proposal which is before us for the closing of debate at long last by a constitutional majority, as it is called.

Bearing in mind that this is the proposal of the Committee on Rules and Administration, reported by a majority of that committee, let us see what they said. They say, first:

> Protracted speaking which is not intended to illuminate that decision, but to prevent its occurrence, makes a mockery of freedom of speech by confusing it with freedom to obstruct.

Then they say:

> In the opinion of the majority of the committee, neither freedom of speech nor the right of full debate in the Senate is at issue in this recommendation that Senate Resolution 17 be adopted by the Senate.

Mr. President, what those who oppose this plan are really contending for is the proposition that the power represented in the Senate by two Senators from each State is the power of the State rather than the power of the Senate. That is exactly what was implied by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. TALMADGE] in his minority views, when it is said, as I stated in my individual views:

> The power of the State he [a Senator] represents would be effectively diminished in derogation of the constitutional balance and whether, in effect, he is violating a trust by assenting to a loss of some incident of sovereignty of the State.

The whole concept of the argument against the proposal before us in the amendment is that the sovereignty of the States is what is represented by the Senators in this body. Obviously, this is completely contrary to the Constitution of the United States, which specifically said that this is not a chamber of States; it is a Chamber of Senators. If we have any doubt about that, the adoption of the amendment for the popular election of Senators certainly put an end to doubt on that question. Yet that idea is contended for successfully, I might point out, in this Chamber; and it is voted for; and, let us not mistake this, it is voted for by Senators who consider themselves liberals, who have run for election on liberal platforms, and who have taken a position with the people in State after State of the United States who have elected them exactly to the contrary of that philosophy.

While I am on that subject, although there are not many Senators in the Chamber, let us be clear about one thing. I ask my colleagues, especially those who are newly elected, to put themselves in the positions of some of the rest of us who have run in many campaigns, who have cast votes in the Chamber, and who have listened to the statements of the majority leader, who is most persuasive. If they cast their votes in favor of his proposal, they will wake up to the fact that they have an albatross around their necks come campaign time, because this record will not make pretty reading to the people of the country who desire to unfetter the chains from the Senate, chains which date back long before the space age, long before the airplane age, yes, long before even the automobile age.

We have noted much confusion about the words "simple majority." I have even seen in one of the newspapers a statement by a very distinguished writer who wrote a book about the Senate, portraying the proposition which is before the Senate as the right of 26 Senators to close debate. In other words, a majority of a quorum. I do not know how many times it is necessary to nail to the wall a statement which is not a fact. But let us nail it now, once and for all. It will take 50 Senators to close debate. Fifty Senators is a whole quorum. It will take 50 Senators to close debate. Let us not fail to understand that very, very clearly.

This is a reasonable proposition; it is not an unreasonable proposition. We are faced, on the one hand, with the proposal of the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON], which I think is a meaningless proposal. It is a bogus proposal. I do not say that in any personal sense. All of us have protested our affection for the Senator from Texas. But I say it is bogus because, in effect, it would not have changed—and this is a fact—one single vote with respect to the filibuster, which has been cast since 1917. I repeat that the Johnson proposal would not change one single vote which has been cast with respect to a filibuster since 1917.

Again, how clearly do we have to state that, or how loud do we have to shout it, for the people of the United States to understand that the Johnson proposal is meaningless, and that if we vote for it, we are voting for something which is meaningless. It is worse than meaningless. It takes us backward. It takes us backward because it seeks, although I do not think it can do so under the Constitution, to perpetuate rules of the Senate unless undone by two-thirds of the Senators present and voting, and thus runs exactly contrary to the advisory opinion of the Vice President, which we at least have a chance to sustain, which holds that a majority may close debate at any time on a proposal to change the rules when the proposal is made at the beginning of a new Congress.

So it is not only a meaningless proposal; it is also a proposal which takes us backward instead of forward.

This is a nice, quiet Chamber; there are not many Senators present; but in my opinion, the record must plague, and the record will plague, every Senator who votes the other way.

In 1949, in just such a nice, quiet way, the Senate strangled itself worse than it had been strangled before. Senator after Senator knows that to be a fact, based upon the experience of the last decade. We may do it again today; and from what I can learn, we are very likely to do it. Certainly the power of the heaviest battalions, in terms of votes, is on the other side. All our colleagues are over the age of 21, and they know what they are doing. But certainly there should be no dearth of Senators to tell them, at least, what the facts are, what the situation is, and what the prospect is, so far as those of us who are on my side are concerned.

The whole essence of filibuster is extraconstitutional, and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CASE], who I am sorry is not in the Chamber at the moment, made that point very clear just a little while ago. He suggested that when we go back to the two-thirds vote, we go back to the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, which makes five separate actions by the Senate, including expulsion of a Senator, the overriding of a veto, the ratification of treaties, and so forth, subject to a two-thirds vote. But the Senator from South Dakota asked, where in the Constitution is there a provision for a filibuster? Is not that, after all, the most decisive argument that the filibuster is a concoction of this particular Chamber, which gives a power to the minority which is absolutely extraconstitutional?

If we want that power, then let us obtain it by a constitutional amendment. Let us not do it by fettering ourselves of our own volition with rules, which give the Senate extraconstitutional power. That is certainly clearly spelled out by what the Senator from South Dakota said about a minority.

Speaking about a minority, I shall read one sentence from what I consider to be a very excellent editorial published in the New York Times of January 7, 1959, which states the truth in terms of the free peoples of the world. This statement is so reminiscent of everything which is going on in this Chamber, that it ought to be written in large letters on the walls around us:

> It is easy to find arguments against what has been called the tyranny of the majority, but the tyranny of the minority is and always has been infinitely worse.

As we all know, in legislation there is always a choice between alternatives. The tyranny of the minority, which is what we are seeking to end in this debate, is infinitely worse than any tyranny of the majority, even if such tyranny were intended. That there is in filibusters a tyranny of the minority is something for which we have the words of the filibusterers themselves. The report of the Committee on Rules and Administration, to which reference has been made, has, on page 18, a number of quotations from Senator Underwood, of Alabama. He was filibustering the Dyer antilynching bill, a civil rights bill. Let me read two of the comments he made, very frankly disclosing the hand of the filibusterers to the Senate.

> I do not say that captiously. I think all men here know that under the rules of the Senate, when 15 or 20 or 25 men say that you cannot pass a certain bill, it cannot be passed.

> There is but one way for the Senate now to get down to work and transact the business of the Senate before the 4th of March—

That was when a new Congress would take office—> and that is to get a final disposition of this force bill before anything else is done. Pass it if you can; abandon it if we force you to do so.

Is that the way to legislate in the 20th century, let alone in 1959? I respectfully submit that it is not.

I shall make one other point; then I shall be finished. When this Chamber becomes realistic about filibusters and what we are discussing today, it takes very, very stern measures to protect itself. It knows when it wants to protect itself; it knows when it does not.

There are five separate statutes on the books which have the strictest kind of cloture written right into them as a part of the law. They are the Reorganization Act of 1939, the Reorganization Act of 1945, the Rubber Producing Facilities Disposal Act of 1953, the Department of Defense Reorganization Act of 1958, and the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1958. Each of those laws makes it possible to close debate by a simple majority, once there has been debate for 10 hours, divided equally between the proponents and the opponents. Does not that clearly show the hand in this whole situation? When this body—or the other body—really knows that it wants to act, and wants to act uninhibited and unfettered by an extra constitutional power given to a minority by rule XXII, it knows exactly how to do it. We hear no protestations then about freedom of debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from New York has expired.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield 2 minutes more to the Senator from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. We hear no protestations about freedom of debate and the fact that the minority must have the opportunity to elucidate its position. Apparently they are frequently satisfied, not with 8 weeks, but with 10 hours of debate, for the purpose elucidating their position.

I have rarely heard it said in the other body, where debates are, on the whole, limited to 1, 2, or 3 days, that that body does not express the democratic process.

To sum up, so far as we on this side are concerned, this is a great bipartisan effort. It is an effort on behalf of civil rights. But I believe my colleagues will bear with me, especially the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], who is particularly interested in what I am about to say, when I state that we on this side, if we have a trusteeship at all, have the trusteeship of Abraham Lincoln. Our colleagues have the trusteeship of Jefferson and other great leaders of our country. We, a newer party, have at least the trusteeship of Abraham Lincoln. This is an elementary oath which ought to be taken to contribute to the well-being of the United States and to the well-being of our national aspirations and our national spirit.

Let it be said, equally unequivocally, that there is no greater single barrier to the enjoyment by our citizens of their full constitutional rights than rule XXII as it now stands and as it is proposed to be amended by the resolution of the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON]. It will be exactly the same in terms of being an absolute roadblock to any really effective effort to put the majesty and the authority of the Federal Government behind constitutional guaranties.

Mr. President, if there is no other argument than that one, that argument should command the votes of the majority in this Chamber, because it commands the support of the majority of the people of the United States. Whether that is manifested here today or tomorrow, or in 1960 or 1962, Mr. President, this blot will not out until it is eradicated by a change, because, whether we like it or not, domestically we are going to have to face it abroad. We stand in grave danger of being "licked" by a question of this kind of politics at home. For that reason I appeal to my colleagues to support the Douglas amendment.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I personally thank the distinguished Senator from New York, not only for his speech, but for the magnificent work he has done in the struggle before us.

I now yield 5 minutes to the distinguished senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, it is quite obvious that the purpose of these remarks is to state for the RECORD the conviction and opinions and facts which motivate some of us to support the Douglas amendment to Senate Resolution 5, an amendment which I am proud to cosponsor, along with several other of my colleagues, whose names have been entered in the RECORD long before this.

I should like to deal, for the few moments which are mine, with two or three points which have been developed this morning in the debate. Before I do so, I desire to publicly pay my respects to the distinguished junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. CHURCH] for what I thought was a very excellent presentation of his side of the case. It was one of the most lucid, concise, and logical presentations I have heard for a proposition which, I most respectfully say, I cannot support.

I believe I properly paraphrase, or quote exactly, the Senator from Idaho. He said the issue is, What rule shall the majority adopt to place a limit on debate? Then he restated the issue, to the effect that the issue is what number of Senators shall be able to impose cloture. The Senator from Idaho was able to strip this debate of all of its extra, peripheral coverage, and get right down to the heart and the core of the problem, and I thank him for it.

The Senators who have supported the Johnson resolution have made quite a point of the fact that in practically every area in our government we have majority rule, and particularly in the Senate, except in five instances, where the Constitution specifically states that two-thirds of the Members present and voting shall be controlling. In stating that argument, it seems to me they are making the best possible argument for the rule we advocate, because if the Founding Fathers of the Republic were so deeply concerned over the power of the majority to ride roughshod over the rights of the minority as the proponents of the Johnson resolution seem to indicate, then I should like to know why it was that in the first Congresses of the United States, and in the first Senates of the U.S. Congresses, a majority, a simple majority, a majority of those present and voting, could impose cloture.

Indeed, the framers of the Constitution were fully aware of the tyrannical power of a minority. They were fully aware of the tyranny of a majority. Theye were fully aware of every aspect of human rights, and constitutional rights. They were the authors of many of those rights. Yet when we hear our distinguished colleagues appeal to the so-called logic of history, it is to be found that the logic of history does not bear out their point; and that the constitutional premise on which this Government is founded is essentially that of majority rule for procedure. It is provided that a quorum shall constitute a majority for the purpose of doing business. Yet it was out of that simple quorum that the Founding Fathers were willing to have a majority of it impose cloture.

The Douglas proposal does not ask that. It is a very moderate proposal, providing for 50 of the 98 votes, with specifications as to the time involved in debate, before cloture may be applied.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. Yes.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Is it not also true that in the early Senate, debate could be shut off not merely by a majority of those voting, but could be shut off immediately, without delay, by the device of the previous question?

Mr. HUMPHREY. The Senator, of course, is correct.

As we know, the rules of the Senate were changed as time went on. The rules were extended and changed in one of the most controversial periods of American history, the period just prior to the War Between the States and the period immediately thereafter.

What does the Johnson rule propose? How progressive is this rule? I am not one who says it has no good within it. We have our right to personal viewpoints. I think it contains some beneficial features. But what does the Johnson rule do? Does it take us forward? Does it project us into the second half of the 20th century? Does it facilitate the processes of a deliberative body? It reverts back to 1917. It is better than the so-called Wherry compromise of 1949, but it takes us back to 1917.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DODD in the chair). The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield 3 more minutes to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. HUMPHREY. It seems to me the American people are expecting something a little better than that. I am hopeful their expectation will be fulfilled in the Senate by adopting the majority vote proposal of the Douglas amendment.

The other point which is made is that the Senate is a great deliberative body, and we repeat that statement as if it were some kind of dogma although such iteration does not make it any more deliberative. We hear repeated the statement that the Senate is the greatest deliberative body in the world, and that allegation of statesmanship tides one over for the moment.

What does the expression "deliberative body" have to do with protracted, unlimited debate? The term "deliberative" is not exactly synonymous with the term "filibuster." It seems to me the Senate gained its reputation of being a deliberative body despite the abuses of unlimited debate. When one takes a look at the record which has been compiled by the Legislative Reference Service of the Library of Congress, he will note that an analysis of 22 cloture attempts since 1917, when a cloture rule was first adopted, reveals that 4 petitions received the required two-thirds majority; 9 obtained a majority of the entire membership of the Senate; 15 obtained a majority of those present and voting; 6 obtained only a minority of those present and voting; and 1 resulted in a tie vote.

The cloture rule was drafted by a bipartisan effort having as its purpose the termination of successful filibuster.

The Library of Congress goes on to point out that if the purpose of the cloture rule of 1917—which is the same as the Johnson resolution of 1959—is to terminate successful filibuster, experience shows it has failed to achieve its purpose in 18 of the 22 tests.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield 1 additional minute to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I conclude by saying that those Members of the Senate who are in favor of preserving unlimited debate, which no one can any longer defend—I note at long last that the defense of the indefensible provisions of rule XXII has been dropped—those who insist on the two-thirds requirement, should be aware that it is by majority will that we tax the country half to death. It is by a majority action that social legislation is enacted. It is by majority action that war is declared. It is by majority action that the Government can conscript young men, and even young women. We can literally change the whole structure of our country by a vote of a majority of those present and voting. The minute an attempt is made to stop somebody from talking forever, even on nongermane matters, then someone says that we are trespassing on the rights of the minority. One of the reasons why we want to go ahead and adopt a justifiable rule is that we may get somewhere in protecting rights of the American people. I think the Senate should be more concerned with the rights of the people, and not so much concerned with the privileges of the few.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I wonder if I could address a question to my colleague, the distinguished minority leader [Mr. DIRKSEN]. I do not see the majority leader on the floor. I wonder if the Senator from Illinois can inform me whether he is aware of the intentions of the majority leader. Is further discussion on the negative side of this amendment intended? Does the minority leader know whether the majority leader has speakers who are going to discuss it?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, all I can say is that I know what the majority leader said on the floor, namely, that he did not have any other speakers unless some Senator should make a request for time.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I observe the distinguished majority leader is now entering the Chamber. May I ask the majority leader whether he has any additional speakers who want time?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I am not aware of any. I have momentarily been off the floor, because some persons interested in the proposal are calling Senators off the floor.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I did not hear what the Senator said, except about the time. I have no knowledge of any request for time.

Mr. President, how much time do I have remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas has 8 minutes remaining on the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. One speaker has made a request. I recall one.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I wonder if the Senator from Texas would be willing to get the speaker to the floor, so that the usual rules of debate can be followed, and the affirmative can close the debate.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. How much time does the other side have, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois has 12 minutes on the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may suggest the absence of a quorum, with the time to be taken from my side, with the understanding that the request for the quorum call may be withdrawn in a few minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I hope the RECORD will show that this is not to be considered a precedent that the affirmative always closes debate, because that is not correct. I have no desire to keep the Senator from closing the debate; as a matter of fact, I want him to close the debate and I want him to have a full opportunity to inform each Senator of his views on this subject. I want to be cooperative in that respect, but I do not want the Senate to establish a precedent that the Chair must recognize that the proponent of an amendment always concludes the debate.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. LAUSCHE].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, with respect to the amendment which is pending before the Senate, after considering the arguments made and applying to the issue my own concepts of liberty and service to the people of the country, I have concluded to vote against it.

It is asserted that liberals are sponsoring the proposal which would give to the majority of the Senate the ability to bring to an end a legitimate debate or what might be termed a "filibuster." I submit to my colleagues that every doubt which might arise in the disposition of this issue should and must be resolved in favor of debate. To resolve the doubt against the need for adequate debate would be pointedly contrary to every concept of liberty which I have.

There has been no subject with respect to liberties in the United States which has been protected with greater zeal than the right of the people to speak. That right has been held inviolate when exercised by the humblest citizen of the country. An examination of the decisions of the Supreme Court will reveal that there is no civil right granted by the Bill of Rights, or by the Constitution otherwise, which has been protected with greater zeal than the right to speak.

The proposed amendment contemplates the limiting of the right to speak in that institution of our Government which is supposed to be the voice of the Nation, in discussing vital questions concerning its citizens. I humbly submit to my friends that if there is any doubt in the mind of any Senator such doubt should be resolved firmly and fearlessly for the preservation of debate on the floor of the Senate of the United States.

If I may, I should like to point out to Senators what might arise. Under the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois, which provides for a majority vote of the entire membership of the Senate to bring debate to an end, we could have a situation in which the vote could be 50 to 48. I appeal to those who are urging the adoption of the amendment: Would not that condition demonstrate there was a doubt about the adequacy of the length of time the issue was discussed? By a majority of two votes the debate could be brought to an end.

I have a further thought which deals distinctly with the theory of majority rule. We believe in majority rule, but we likewise with fervor believe in the proposition that the minority must everlastingly be protected against the tyranny and despotism which might reside with the majority.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Ohio has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield one additional minute to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. LAUSCHE. The majority of today is likely to become the minority of tomorrow. The majority of today should not attempt to alter rules solely to suit the convenience of the majority in achieving its objective. I have never seen it fail that when the majority tries to establish convenient rules to serve itself the time is not far distant when that rule operates against the very ones who fashioned it. Guard the minority of this country against the tyranny of the majority.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I yield one additional minute to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, in conclusion, I desire to approach this problem not on the basis of extemporizing and adopting a rule to suit the convenience of the times. This rule should be approached from the standpoint of its eternal operation on all questions which will come before the Senate in the future. It is a mistake to approach the rule—solely for the purpose of solving only the immediate problem of the present time.

I should like to vote with the Senator from Illinois. I believe in the sincerity of his purpose. I know that he is not a professional liberal in the advocacy of this cause; but I simply cannot join him because I believe that what he has advocated is the very antithesis of liberty as we understand it to exist in our country.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, the choice before the Senate is a simple one. Shall we protect the majority from the tyranny of the minority? Shall we have an effective rule to curb filibusters after a full and prolonged and protracted debate, or shall we adopt an almost meaningless gesture?

Shall we open the door to constructive action for equality of opportunity, or shall we close that door in the faces of our millions of Negro and Mexican-American citizens and their children?

Shall we show the world that we can act to carry out the promises of freedom to our own people, or shall we affront the colored peoples of other nations by condemning our own to continued second class citizenship?

CLOTURE PROVISIONS OF JOHNSON RESOLUTION ARE MEANINGLESS GESTURE

I chose my words carefully in describing the main proposal before us, the resolution of the Senator from Texas for cloture by two-thirds of those present, as a meaningless gesture.

It is a return to the 1917–1949 rule. That rule proved unworkable by long, bitter experience. Cloture could not be secured under it on a single civil rights bill, though large majorities twice voted for such measures.

The statement by the late Senator Underwood of Alabama, which has been quoted earlier in this debate, and which was made openly on the floor of the Senate, was to the effect that a group of Senators could prevent a vote by interminable debate. That statement was made during the very period when the 1917 rule was in effect; and it is to that rule that the Senator from Texas is now proposing that the Senate return.

In the second place, we shall have, on such crucial questions as civil rights, and on other crucial measures, almost a full attendance; and when this happens, two-thirds of the Senators present and voting means virtually the same as two-thirds of all those elected. In the vote the other day only one Member of the Senate was absent. In the last two crucial votes on civil rights questions, only three Members were absent; and it is interesting to note that in all those cases the absentees were not on the southern side, but on the northern and western side.

Therefore there is virtually no difference between the two-thirds requirement under the present rule and the two-thirds requirement proposed by the Senator from Texas. This is admitted by the field marshal of the southern forces, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], who stated to the Associated Press last week that a requirement for two-thirds of the Senators present and voting is little different from a requirement for two-thirds of the full membership, because in voting on a disputed question most Senators would be present, anyway.

The same thing is admitted by Mr. Walter Lippmann, one of the most eminent defenders of the proposal of the Senator from Texas, when he says:

> So the Johnson proposal is not substantially different from the existing rule.

While the able and astute majority leader has ably marketed this proposal for public consumption as a compromise to which all reasonable men should give their full support, it is nothing of the sort.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield on the time of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield myself half a minute.

First of all, the Senator puts words in my mouth. I have not branded my proposal as a compromise. That is the brand of others. I know not exactly who branded it.

Secondly, I remind the Senator that some 40 of his colleagues introduced a similar proposal in this body a year ago, and it has been pending. So it is not merely the proposal of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator from Texas is the leader of the movement.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. It is supported by 40 of the Senator's colleagues—a rather substantial number.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I thank the Senator.

This proposal of the Senator from Texas is in no sense a compromise. It is merely another line of defense for the filibuster, on virtually the same ground as the filibuster defenses in the present rules. Whatever the motives may be, the effect would be to deceive the American public into thinking it was getting something, when it was getting nothing.

Let me now add a word to Members of the Senate on my side of the aisle. The proposal of the Senator from Texas is contrary to the platform of our party in 1952 and 1956. Our party twice explicitly declared for a majority vote in determining the rules of the Senate at the beginning of a session and in bringing debate to a close on a bill. Upon that platform most Members of the Senate from the North and West campaigned. The public voted for them in the belief that they would support this proposal, among other measures.

The proposal of the Senator from Texas would not open the door to needed legislation for equal justice. It would leave the filibuster and the threat of filibuster hanging over the heads of Senators. We might as well place the crown of King Filibuster over the head of the Presiding Officer, with a cotton stalk and a tobacco leaf on either side, rather than the lion and unicorn. I would be opposed to operating under the Crown of Great Britain. I am also opposed to operating under the crown of King Filibuster.

PENDING (DOUGLAS) AMENDMENT WOULD PERMIT MAJORITY OF ALL SENATORS TO REACH A VOTE AFTER EXTENSIVE DEBATE

The pending amendment, which I have offered in behalf of myself and 14 other Senators, however, would restore to the Senate the power to act after prolonged and protracted debate, when a majority of all those elected to the Senate, or 50 Members, voted to limit debate.

The proposal which 15 of us are advancing is the heart of the rule change recommended by a majority of the Committee on Rules and Administration in 1958.

Let us be clear once again as to just what it provides. It provides that when 16 Senators join together in a motion for that purpose, after 15 days pass, excluding Sundays and holidays, following the making of the motion, the question shall be put to the Senate whether debate shall thereafter be limited; if a majority of those chosen and sworn, or 50 Members, vote in the affirmative, debate is thereafter limited to 1 hour for each Senator.

It should not be necessary at this hour to repeat that this is not cloture by a majority of a quorum, or 26 votes, as the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] was apparently led to believe and stated in the Senate on Friday last, as shown on pages 313 and 314 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and as I understood the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CASE] to say today. Perhaps the Senator from Wyoming was misled by a prominent newsman's magazine article mentioning "a mere majority of a quorum of the Senate," and later press references to a "bare majority."

Our proposal would require a majority of all the Senate, not a majority of a quorum. It would guarantee extended debate, up to 8 weeks or more, as I have outlined it in the Senate earlier, if the opposition chooses to debate both the motion to bring up a bill and the bill itself.

This is not a "gag rule" or "indefensible extremism," as its opponents have tried to paint it.

It is much more mild than the majority cloture provisions in effect in most of the State senates, including those in most of the Southern States, as well as that followed in the Confederate senate itself.

It is a higher requirement than the Constitution makes for legislation generally, as has been pointed out, including a declaration of war and the appropriation of billions of dollars.

Considering the guaranties of extended debate; the requirement of 16 Senators to join in the motion; the fact that no motion would thus be made until after 2 to 3 weeks of debate, which gave some evidence of a filibuster; the provision for a further lapse of 15 days after the motion is made; the provision for 1 hour of debate for each Senator after the debate is limited; and the chance of going through this process on the motion to take up, as well as on the bill itself, the moderation of this proposal must be obvious to all reasonable persons.

The Senate today has a chance to strike a blow for freedom. For its own freedom from the filibuster—for its own freedom to vote, after adequate discussion; for the freedom of millions of our fellow citizens who look to us to help end the denial of their rights.

The passage of the pending amendment is the pathway to those freedoms.

The whole Nation—and, indeed, the whole world—will be watching the roll-call which will come in just a moment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, is the Senator from Illinois ready to vote?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes; I am prepared to vote.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time on condition that the Senator from Illinois will do likewise.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may suggest the absence of a quorum, and that at the conclusion of the quorum call, the Senate proceed to vote on the pending proposal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DODD in the chair). Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FREAR in the chair). A quorum is present.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Chair state the question before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], on behalf of himself and other Senators, providing for a majority vote on cloture after 15 days of debate.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time for debate has expired. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ANDERSON (when his name was called). During the colloquy the other day I agreed with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] that on the voting on some of the amendments I would pair with him. I understand that he would vote "nay" on the pending amendment. I also desire to vote "nay" on it. Therefore I do vote "nay" regardless of any agreement.

The rollcall was concluded.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER] is absent because of illness.

I further announce that on this vote the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER] is paired with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT]. If present and voting, the Senator from Oregon would vote "yea," and the Senator from South Dakota would vote nay.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I announce that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] is absent on official business, and, if present and voting, he would vote "nay."

The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT], who is absent on official business, is paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER]. If present and voting, the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT] would vote "nay" and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER] would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 28; nays 67, as follows:

NOT VOTING—3

Bridges	Mundt	Neuberger

So the amendment offered by Mr. DOUGLAS on behalf of himself and other Senators was rejected.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I call up my amendment designated "1–8–59B" and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 1, line 5, it is proposed to strike out the words "two-thirds" and insert in lieu thereof "three-fifths."

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I yield myself 10 minutes. I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kentucky yield on my time?

Mr. MORTON. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I have reviewed the legislative situation and the unanimous-consent agreement with the minority leader. With the amendments at the desk, if all time is used, it should be possible to conclude action on all the amendments today. I should like all Senators to be on notice that we expect to conclude with the amendments today, and shall make every effort to do so. Frequently all time allotted, either for or against the amendments, is not used. So Senators should be prepared, during the afternoon and the evening, to vote.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I think the majority leader should clarify for the Senate whether he means that action will be concluded on all amendments which are still pending. I think four or five amendments are pending. Does he contemplate concluding action on all of them and also on the adoption of the resolution?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Not necessarily on the adoption of the resolution, because 4 hours have been allotted for debate on the resolution. But it is my hope that we may conclude action on all the amendments today. If that requires the use of a part of the time allotted for debate on the adoption of the resolution, we shall have to determine that as we go along.

We do expect to conclude action on the Morton amendment and the amendments offered by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. CASE], the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CASE], and the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS]. It may be that we will not conclude action on the resolution itself this afternoon; but we shall have to decide that in the light of the progress which is made on the amendments.

Mr. President, I again ask that the time for this announcement may come out of my time on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, as I understand, each side has 1 hour on this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Is that time adequate for the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. MORTON. It is more than adequate.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Then, Mr. President, I should like all Senators to know that there is a possibility of a vote at any time between 3:15 and 4 o'clock. Under the unanimous-consent agreement, each side will have 1 hour. I do not know how many requests will be made for time; but in no event will there be a vote later than 4 o'clock, as I can anticipate events; and it should occur sometime between 3:30 and 4 o'clock.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I offer the amendment on behalf of myself, my colleague, the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON], and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT]. I offered the amendment and asked that it be printed and lie on the desk late Thursday evening. At that time I thought there was a possibility that the Senate would dispose of the whole matter on Friday or Saturday. I had intended offering such an amendment, so I hurriedly prepared it and offered it so that it could be printed.

I know that my colleague, the senior Senator from Kentucky, had come to a conclusion similar to mine as to the substance of the amendment. I understand the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON] reached the same position. We came to those positions independently. I did not have time to circulate the amendment prior to having it printed, but I am happy now to accept and to welcome my colleagues as cosponsors. I desire that the RECORD show that we arrived at our positions independently as to the substance of the amendment, itself.

The amendment is a very simple one. It merely substitutes "three-fifths" for "two-thirds" in line 5 of the Johnson resolution. In other words, three-fifths of the Senators present and voting could invoke cloture, rather than two-thirds.

I have consistently taken the position that there should be some change in the rules of the Senate so as to relax the requirement for invoking cloture. I have also consistently taken the position that such change should be moderate in nature, and I believe that the change which I propose is moderate in nature.

I opposed the Douglas amendment, on which the Senate has just voted, because I felt it went too far in relaxing the requirements for invoking cloture.

If I should be asked, "Why is not the Johnson proposal a moderate step toward relaxing the requirements for invoking cloture?" I would say it is, especially in one part, section 2, which, in effect, would apply to procedural matters before the Senate, such as rule changes, the same cloture rule which would apply to substantive matters. I am in accord with that section of the Johnson proposal.

The question might be asked, why this quibbling between two-thirds and three-fifths? In fact, as has been pointed out time and again in debate on the floor, I think there is little difference between two-thirds of those present and voting and two-thirds of those elected and sworn. The same statement applies to 50 percent, a majority, three-fifths, or any other number, because when the chips are down, we all get here. In my short service in the Senate, I have seen times when Senators have actually been brought into the Senate Chamber by ambulance from the naval hospital at Bethesda or Walter Reed Hospital. We know, and the RECORD was made clear by the Senator from Illinois, that when the chips are down, practically all Senators get here, and if two or three Senators are absent, chances are they can be paired on the vote. So that, in fact, the provision of two-thirds of those present is not much of a relaxation from the present provision of two-thirds of those elected and sworn.

I think the three-fifths proposal in the amendment which we have offered is a moderate change toward relaxing the rules and toward permitting the invoking of cloture. I say let us try it. It is a moderate step in this direction. I believe the Senate can pass any legislation it really wants to pass under the proposal which we are putting forward today.

The history of our country, I think, demonstrates that changes which have occurred in our legislative policy have been moderate changes, for the most part. We certainly did not undertake a full-blown program, let us say, of social security. The program has been built up over the last 20 years. We have not suddenly taken drastic steps, one way or another, except at certain times. When we have done so it generally has not been in the best interests of the country. In the history of the Nation we have taken drastic steps, in one direction or another, in the matter of tariffs. Our tariff policies have suddenly changed to a substantially greater protection or to a substantial lowering of trade barriers. When those great changes have been made, one way or another, the economic impact on the country has not been good. We made drastic changes in the fiscal policy of the United States in respect to the purchase of silver many years ago, and the effect was rather ill on the Nation's economy.

By and large, our great progress has occurred as a result of making moderate changes, in one direction or another; and our two-party system has given to this country a balance which leads to moderation in changes in legislative policy and in changes resulting from laws which had been enacted by the Congress of the United States. History shows we have gone forward as a Nation because we have been slow to swing the pendulum too violently in either direction.

For myself and my colleagues, therefore, I offer this amendment as one of moderation. I accept, and will support vigorously, section 2 of the Johnson proposal, which means that the cloture rule applies to procedure as well as to substance. I disagree with the proposal only in that I do not believe the provision for the two-thirds of those elected and present is a sufficient change from the rule which is now in effect. I therefore respectfully urge the adoption of the amendment I have proposed. I reserve the remainder of my time.

I yield 10 minutes to my colleague the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER].

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BIBLE in the chair). The Senator from Kentucky is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, I have joined with my colleague, the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. MORTON], and with the junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON], in offering the pending amendment. As my colleague has stated, each of us arrived at his decision to present such an amendment independently.

The amendment is simple. It would amend the resolution which is now before the Senate, and which has been offered by the majority leader, in one respect. It would provide that three-fifths of those present and voting would be able to invoke cloture instead of the two-thirds proposed by the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON].

I should like to state the considerations which lead me to support this amendment, and which I think give it substance. In the first place, I would say frankly, it is designed to find a middle ground between the two main proposals which have been before the Senate for several days, the resolutions of the majority leader and that of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS]. I do not think I have to say that both of those proposals are met by the opposition of a substantial number of the Members of the Senate. And it is true, there is substantial opposition in the country to both of the main proposals which have been before the Senate.

In 1953, in 1957, and again in 1959, a vigorous effort was made by many Members of the Senate to assert the constitutional right of the Senate to fix its rules at the beginning of each new session. I supported this effort in 1957, and again in 1959, at the beginning of the Congress.

This effort represented the belief that the Senate has the constitutional right to fix its rules at the beginning of each new session. As a practical matter, we know that the principal reason which initiated the movement to adopt new rules was opposition to rule XXII.

In the Senate today, after able arguments presented by the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], and by my colleagues and friends, the senior Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS], the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. CASE] and other Senators, a decisive vote was cast against the closure of debate by a constitutional majority.

In this situation, with two large bodies of opinion in the Senate, one opposing the view of the other, as well as two bodies of opinion in the country opposing what can be called these main positions, one purpose of the pending amendment is to see if there is not some acceptable middle ground.

I know it can be assumed by some persons that three-fifths of the Senators voting is just a figure pulled from the air, that it is an arbitrary figure, and that there may be no rationale or reason for proposing it. I should like to suggest that there is a rationale for this amendment, one was suggested by the proponents of the two main issues which have been before the Senate.

Of course, the effort of the Senator from Illinois, the Senator from New York, and other Senators is directed toward attaining cloture by a smaller number of Senators than is now required by our rules, and namely, to do so by a constitutional majority. If the resolution of the Senator from Texas, the majority leader, means anything, his resolution presupposes that cloture can be attained by a smaller number than two-thirds of those duly chosen and sworn. If that were not true, there would be no reason for offering the resolution, for there would be no difference between his resolution and the existing rule, in this respect.

We can assume that if the proposition of the distinguished Senator from Texas is agreed to, it is expected that in some cases, at least, a smaller number than 66 Senators could achieve cloture.

It has been shown, also, by the very exhaustive records which have been placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD by the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS] that usually 2 or 3 Senators are absent when some important vote is taken, so the practical result of the resolution offered by the Senator from Texas must be that he is saying that in some cases cloture could be obtained by the votes of 64 or 63 Members.

The effect of the amendment which my colleague has offered, and in which I have joined, would be to prescribe that in no case would more than 59 votes be required for cloture. Judging from the experience which has been elaborated for the record by the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS]—that is, that the experience of the Senate indicates an absence of 2 or 3 Senators on important issues—it is possible that in many cases only 55 or 56 votes would be required to achieve cloture if our amendment is adopted.

It seems to us that our proposal would attain two objectives. In the first place, it would assure ample debate of any proposition before the Senate.

In the second place, this procedure would assure, we believe, that ultimately there could be a vote upon the major issues which come before the Senate. The fact that 55 to 59 Senators could cut off debate would tend to discourage filibusters and keep the debate to the issues.

I do not believe, myself, that there is much difference between the rule proposed by the Senator from Texas and the existing rule with respect to the two-thirds rule. It is an improvement in that it would make cloture apply to a motion to change the rules—not possible under existing rules.

I can argue, as can my colleague, that our proposal would offer to the Senate a better opportunity for an ultimate vote upon the great issues which will come before it than would the majority leader's resolution.

It was very difficult for me to vote against the Douglas amendment. It was a difficult matter because I do not like filibusters, which go beyond the purpose of full debate and whose purpose is to prevent an ultimate vote. I will say I disliked voting against the Douglas proposal because I know it is joined with the issue of civil rights. In my public life of nearly 30 years in different positions, I have by action and by vote attempted to express in action my belief that full freedom and full civil rights are the constitutional right and must be assured to every person in our country.

I know, from some short experience in other countries, that the failure to assure the civil rights of all our people has caused us and will continue to cause us great trouble, as we attempt to conduct our foreign relations, and as we attempt to convince the peoples of the world that we are on the side of freedom.

But I know also that there are many institutions in our Government designed to protect minorities. The process of true debate is not only intended to protect minorities, but also to guard against the passions, the bad judgment and the misinformation which at times sweep our country. Unfortunately, in the case of rule XXII, the rule is now being used against a minority. Taking into consideration both the long continuing problem——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the senior Senator from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. MORTON. I yield 3 additional minutes to the senior Senator from Kentucky.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The senior Senator from Kentucky is recognized for 3 additional minutes.

Mr. COOPER. The problem of civil rights will be a continuing one, until civil rights are assured all our people. The problem of maintaining the institutions of our country, of protecting minorities of the country against the passions and bad judgment of a majority at a certain time—will always be with us.

I found myself unable to vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois and by my friend the Senator from New York, that a simple majority should cut off debate.

The amendment which has been offered by my colleague from Kentucky and which I cosponsor gives us an opportunity to better the existing situation. It would provide a middle ground. There is reason for the amendment; for it would effectively carry out what the Senator from Texas claims for his resolution. Third, if the amendment is agreed to and if it proves effective, it can meet the immediate problem of providing civil rights legislation, and at the same time preserve the tradition of extended debate and discussion in the Senate and before public opinion.

I hope that Senators will give consideration to the amendment, and that it will be agreed to by a large vote.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. While there is a disagreement between the Senator from Kentucky and me on the merits or demerits of so-called majority cloture, I nevertheless respect his view. At the present status of consideration of the pending measure, I find myself in complete agreement that the Morton amendment should be adopted.

In that connection, Mr. President, I should like very much to obtain unanimous consent—which I hereby request—to have printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks an editorial from the Courier-Journal of Louisville, Ky., of January 6, 1959, in regard to the present suggestion by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. MORTON]. The editorial ascribes it to the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER], but I am sure the editorial refers to both Senators. It is a real contribution to the debate at this point.

Again I will state I do not agree fully with the views as to majority cloture, but I fully agree as to the desirability of approval of the pending amendment at this juncture.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Jersey?

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HOW TO STOP A BLOODY BATTLE ON CHANGING SENATE RULE XXII

Senator JOHN SHERMAN COOPER is a true moderate in public life, though he is cast as the leader of the progressive wing of the Republican Party in the Senate. The Kentuckian has proposed a moderate compromise to the filibuster issue. It strikes us as decent, logical, and practical.

It is his suggestion that after a long period of Senate debate on any given issue, a limit might be placed on further discussion by a vote of three-fifths of the Members present, or of the entire Senate membership. In the latter case, such action would require 59 votes.

Nobody has proposed that any limit at all be imposed until after 6 or 8 weeks of debate on an issue. In our era of rapid communications, that should be ample time for the public to be informed of every relevant fact and opinion on the subject.

A group of Democratic and Republican Senators, ably led by PAUL DOUGLAS of Illinois, have proposed that debate be limited after such a considerable period by a straight majority vote of the Senate. The standpatters of both parties on this issue speak with the voice of Senator LYNDON JOHNSON. They want to preserve the present rule that two-thirds of the Senate membership, or 66 Members, must vote to impose "cloture," which means to limit debate.

AN UNACCEPTABLE PROPOSAL

The only compromise offered until COOPER spoke was not acceptable. Senator JOHNSON suggested action by two-thirds of the Senators present and voting, rather than by two-thirds of the total membership. But the Douglas reformers point out that this is really no compromise at all, since the party leadership can muster the full strength of the upper house to vote on a measure of this significance.

A split among the Democratic majority on this point threatens at the very opening of the new Congress tomorrow. It could result not only in a bitter factional fight among the Democrats, but in a long struggle that would hamper and obstruct other vital legislation.

That is why it is important for more than partisan reasons to find a true compromise that has some chance to be accepted. JOHN COOPER has put one forward that could be adopted with dignity by both sides.

Many well-informed citizens have been cautious on this issue. They realize that the filibuster question involves far more than the present heated controversy over civil rights legislation. They know that there have been other issues in the past, and that there will be more in the future, on which it is vital to safeguard the right of a Senate minority to state their case at great and even wearisome length.

Such people should be swayed by the moderate Cooper proposal. It would allow ample protection to minority voices in the Senate, yet it would have some power to prevent the sort of situation described with such indignation by Woodrow Wilson, when "a little group of willful men, reflecting no opinion but their own, have rendered the great Government of the United States helpless and contemptible."

A FULL TWO-THIRDS VOTE

Any change in the rule of unlimited debate in the past has been blocked by the fact that even the discussion of a change could be filibustered to death by a third of the Senate membership. Those who favor a change in the rules argue that each Senate is a new body, which should be free to adopt its own rules by majority vote. The opposition has held that the Senate is a continuing body, since only a third of its Members can be up for election between one session and the next.

The case for considering the incoming Senate a new entity has been stated with great clarity by Senator JOSEPH S. CLARK in a letter to the New York Times: "No bill introduced in the 85th Congress can be passed by the 86th Congress without reintroduction and reference to committee; the committees of the 85th Congress must be reconstituted, and they have no continuing power over matters pending when the 85th Congress dies; the authority of the majority and minority leaders, the whips, and the President pro tempore all expire."

This point of procedure could be settled by agreement if the main issue of how to limit debate were resolved. Senator JOHNSON, the most skillful party leader the Senate has seen for many a year, would be wise to accept the Cooper compromise, thus freeing himself to forge a united program of action for his party in its position of heavy congressional responsibility.

Senator DOUGLAS and his supporters, too, would be sensible to give some ground on this issue, so as to meet the Johnson group at a logical middle point. Senator COOPER has suggested just such a meeting place.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Vermont.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont is recognized for 2 minutes.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, in voting on the various proposals for amending rule XXII I think it is a good idea to take into account the practical effects. I find that in the 22 times in which proposals for cloture have been considered since 1919 there has been an average of 85 Senators present in the Chamber. Assuming that the two Senators from Alaska will always be in their seats, as I presume they will be, if the average of the past prevails there will be 87 Senators on the floor whenever a proposal to close debate is made.

Under the Douglas proposal, in order to impose cloture, 50 Senators would have to vote for cloture. I voted for the Douglas proposal, but I am not unhappy it did not carry. My vote may be properly interpreted as an effort to give moral support to those who believe in improving the present situation.

Under the Morton proposal, or the 60 percent proposal, with such an average number of Senators present there would have to be 53 votes in favor of cloture. That would be 54 percent of the total number of Senators elected and seated.

Under the Johnson proposal, there would have to be 58 Senators voting in favor of cloture, assuming that the stated average number of Senators were in attendance at the time the motion was made.

Under the present rule, if there is no change made at all, there would be required the votes of 66 Senators to invoke cloture.

Therefore, Mr. President, we have a choice among 50, 53, 58, or 66 votes to invoke cloture. It seems to me that the proposal of the Senator from Kentucky is the best of these four routes which we may take, and therefore I shall support the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I yield 3 minutes to the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon is recognized for 3 minutes.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I shall support the Morton proposal for the imposing of cloture by a three-fifths vote.

In supporting the amendment, I want to make perfectly clear that I much prefer the majority rule principle of the Douglas proposal, which, as has been pointed out, did not provide for a majority vote of a quorum but provided for a majority vote of the membership of the Senate.

Mr. President, I wish to address a remark or two on this legislative problem to my liberal colleagues in the Senate.

When is a liberal justified in accepting a compromise involving a modification to his previously announced stand on proposed legislation? In my opinion, whenever a conscionable compromise is proposed, and when that compromise, in fact, does not destroy a basic principle for which the Senator has been standing.

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN] has just called attention to what I consider to be the controlling vital statistics on this issue. As I pointed out the other night in my long speech in the Senate in opposition to the Johnson proposal, if we go back through the various filibuster fights in the Senate, we find that not once was the type of majority called for by the Johnson proposal ever attained on a civil rights issue. Therefore, as the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] has pointed out, the Johnson proposal is no real improvement at all in the light of the great need in the Senate for an emancipation proclamation of parliamentary freedom, which will deliver the Senate from minority control.

On the other hand, as pointed out by the Senator from Vermont, the statistics show that a three-fifths vote would enable us, on the basis of the past record, to obtain cloture on civil rights as well as other issues. If history repeats itself, as I think it will, the adoption of the Morton amendment proposing a conscionable compromise would be a step forward. Therefore, because I think it is so much to be preferred to a further fixing upon the Senate of the principle of minority control, I shall vote for the Morton proposal. However, let me make it very clear that under no circumstances would I ever vote for the Johnson proposal, because that proposal offers no conscionable compromise. It offers a surrender. It is mere political window dressing. According to my code of liberalism, a liberal cannot vote for the Johnson pretense because he would not be voting for a real improvement in the rules of the Senate. He would be voting for what I respectfully say would be but a pretense of improvement, and I will not vote for anything which, in my judgment, is in fact a pretense.

It is said that the Johnson proposal would apply to motions to change the rules. The Senate can do that anyway at the beginning of a new Congress under Article I section 5 of the Constitution. This claim of the Johnson advocates is but a part of their smokescreen arguments. Let me warn the Senate that the political vision of the American voters will not be blinded by such a forensic smokescreen here in the Senate.

I have never been a party, and I do not propose, in the closing hours of this debate, to allow myself to be made a party, to what I consider to be one of the most fallacious arguments which has run through this issue over the years, namely, that a majority of the Senate cannot proceed, at the beginning of a new Congress, to consider its rules. My position is not based on any theory as to whether the Senate is or is not a continuing body. I have always held that it is a continuing body for many purposes. The Senate always has the authority to consider rules at the beginning of a new session, under the Constitution. Therefore, this particular section of the Johnson proposal is more pretense and more parliamentary window dressing, and I will not vote for it. I will vote for the Morton proposal; and if the Morton proposal is defeated, I shall vote against the Johnson proposal.

Mr. President, I close by saying that my party had better keep its commitments to the American people. The Democratic platforms of 1952 and 1956 cannot be reconciled with the Johnson proposal, and I do not propose to walk out on my pledges.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I yield myself 30 seconds.

I do not wish to confuse the issue by having this question identified with the Democratic platform. That is not in my proposal at all.

I now yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY].

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I appreciate the courtesy of the Senator from Kentucky in yielding me a few minutes. I also understand the conditions under which the yielding has been done, namely, that the proposal of the Senator from Kentucky is not to be construed in any way as a part of the Democratic platform.

Let us at least construe it as a constructive proposal in the Senate.

I believe we have debated this subject matter at sufficient length. I shall not detain the Senate for very long. I am for the three-fifths proposal—a rule requiring the votes of three-fifths of the Senators present and voting. This proposal has been offered by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. MORTON]. I feel that it is better than a two-thirds rule. I still feel that the proposal of which I was privileged to be a cosponsor, the so-called Douglas proposal, is a truly meritorious one, and would have provided a substantially improved rule for Senate debates.

The Senator from Kentucky has offered an amendment which has been in the minds of many Members of the Senate. I have talked with at least half a dozen or more Senators, who have indicated to me that they were of the opinion that somewhere between a majority and two-thirds ought to be a reasonable figure, upon which we could agree. I believe the three-fifths proposal is just that. I have discussed this subject with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON], and other Senators.

I conclude my remarks by saying that the Johnson proposal is nothing more nor less than a proposal to recoup the losses suffered in 1949. It would take us back to 1917. The Johnson proposal, or the rule requiring two-thirds of those present and voting, as the RECORD reveals, would do very little—at least in terms of the history of filibustering—to curb filibusters. The three-fifths proposal would at least be some improvement. It represents a most moderate and mild adjustment. I am hopeful that it will be adopted. I trust that before the debate is concluded some of our colleagues in the Senate who have long been interested in the issue of civil rights and the issue of the Senate rules will take a good look at the headlines which have been appearing in the newspapers of cities throughout the land.

For example, here is a headline from the Washington Post of January 10: "Senate Liberals Fail in Filibuster Test."

This headline is from the Washington Evening Star of January 9: "Liberals Lose Test on Filibuster."

From the New York Herald Tribune of January 10: "Civil Rights Bloc Loses in the Senate."

From the New York Times of January 10: "Foes of Filibuster Defeated."

There may be some parts of the United States where the principle of filibustering is popular. There may be some places in the United States where the rules question is not as important as elsewhere. But I believe that every one of our colleagues ought to recognize that the public has been told and is being told that those of us who are opposed to the filibuster are taking one defeat after another.

It seems to me that one way we can at least give ourselves a reasonably good record upon which to stand is to vote for the middle-of-the-road, moderate, sensible, and reasonable proposal which has been offered by the distinguished Senator from Kentucky.

I felt that the proposal upon which we voted a short time ago, the so-called Douglas proposal, had all those qualities. However, it was rejected by a very substantial vote. I am confident that if Members of the Senate really understand the change proposed by the Senator from Kentucky, his proposal will be adopted.

I thank the Senator from Kentucky for yielding to me in order that I might express my views.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS].

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, first I wish to state that I intend to support the amendment of my colleague from Kentucky [Mr. MORTON], and my colleague from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON], because I think it is the logical next step in what we have been trying to do for the past week.

It is fair to say that this is the "last clear chance," as the courts say, that we shall have to do anything meaningful about the number of Senators who can cut off a filibuster. The debate on succeeding amendments will go to the question of what other Congresses can do. I believe this is the last clear opportunity in this Congress to do anything meaningful about actually dealing with the question in practical terms.

The figures have already been stated. They are very interesting. If we were to apply the Morton-Cooper proposal, 8 out of the last 22 filibusters since 1922 could have been shut off, as compared with 9 which might have been cut off had the Douglas proposal, which was rejected, been in effect.

This proposal is what the lawyers call de minimis, in terms of what should be done by this Congress. What is of great significance, in terms of the Morton-Cooper proposal, is that it would have succeeded in invoking cloture in respect to two civil rights bills. That is the field in which it really means something.

As I have said, this is the last clear opportunity that will mean something. The votes to which I refer were on May 19, 1950, and July 12, 1950. Those were votes on very mild fair employment practices bills. I happened to vote on them in the other body, as did my colleague from Kentucky [Mr. MORTON] I believe.

In this body the threat to impose cloture was decided in one case by a vote of 52 to 32, and in the other case by a vote of 55 to 33. Those two motions would have been successful if the rule had been as it is now proposed by the Senator from Kentucky to make it. I mention that fact, because it goes to the question of a fractional majority imposing cloture.

In that case, on May 19, 1950, the will of a decisive majority of the Senate was defeated by a vote of 52 Members out of 96. On July 12, 1950, the question was decided by the votes of 55 out of 96. The calculated judgment of the majority was completely frustrated because they could not succeed in having a cloture motion adopted, and hence those bills had to be laid aside.

I repeat, that this is the last clear chance to do anything practical about actually effecting cloture against a filibuster, which frustrates the will of the majority, and results in the rejection or laying aside of proposed legislation which a majority wishes to pass.

I sincerely believe that the power of the filibuster represents an extraconstitutional power in a minority which was never contemplated by the Founding Fathers, and which is inconsistent with the welfare of our country.

I very much hope, therefore, that the excellent amendment of my colleagues from Kentucky, upon which I compliment them, will represent a reasonable compromise which can be adopted by this body.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Wyoming.

POLITICAL AND ECONOMIC FREEDOM AT STAKE

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I recognize the deep sincerity with which Members of the Senate who have stood for various methods of shutting off debate have acted. Free speech can be abused and a filibuster is an abuse of free debate. I am willing to kill the filibuster but I will do everything I can to preserve free speech in the Senate.

During this debate we first had talk about the old parliamentary rules by which, for example, the previous question could be moved and carried by a majority of one of a quorum. Then there was the suggestion by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGAS] and his colleagues that a majority of 50 duly sworn and elected Senators could impose cloture. Now there is this new proposal to invoke it by three-fifths of the whole membership.

In each instance I applaud the sincerity of the sponsors of the proposals. However, I believe most deeply that they are acting in a misapprehension of the great dangers of the times in which we live. We cannot be at all apprised of the political and economic events of our times without knowing that a concentration of economic power and a concentration of political power are destroying free government.

It is because I am liberal and wish to maintain free government that I am against these limitations upon debate. They are unnecessary limitations.

The senior Senator from New York has just concluded citing some eight cases in which, he said, the filibuster killed a bill. In that connection he must prove that those bills which were killed by a filibuster were good bills. They might not have been. I have been a Member of the Senate, with the exception of about 20 months, since the first of January 1934. I say in all earnestness that I recall but few cases in which a filibuster succeeded against a bill the Senate really wanted unless it were being conducted against the hour of adjournment.

With respect to what the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] said a few moments ago, about newspaper publicity concerning filibusters and about liberals being defeated, all of that is based upon a false concept. It is a false concept that good legislation is always being defeated by filibusters. The opponents of the Johnson resolution talk about civil rights. Yet the Senate in the last session passed a civil rights bill without a filibuster and under the rule which the Johnson amendment would change and make filibusters practically impossible against Senate rules.

My reason for voting against the pending amendment can be explained in this fashion: Concentration of economic and political power is at the very basis of the struggle which is now going on between communism and the free world. Mr. Mikoyan of the Soviet Union is now in the United States—at least I believe he has not yet departed—talking about trade with Russia. We have heard nothing in the press about Soviet trade with Finland. The story as to Finland is that the Soviet government canceled innumerable contracts which it had made with businessmen in Finland in order to bring about a collapse of the government of a non-Communist nation, namely, Finland. The Communists are waging an economic war against us. To protect ourselves we must preserve free speech here.

Last July, as acting chairman of the Subcommittee on Antitrust and Monopoly Legislation, I submitted, in a letter to the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. EASTLAND], chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, a report on the concentration of American industry. It came about as a result of an analysis of a census of manufacturers. It shows that most of the commodities which are manufactured in the United States and on which the people of the United States depend for their daily living are now being manufactured by a few giant corporations, that in some cases 4 companies—and in some cases 8 or less companies—out of 75 or 100 or even 1,000 companies, produce between 75 and 100 percent of the total output. Economic concentration leads to political concentration.

In my judgment, it is vitally important for the economic freedom of the United States and the economic freedom of the world to defeat every one of the amendments which would destroy the Senate as the forum for the defense of the economic liberty of the people.

I am standing for the principle of free speech and the protection of minorities. I say to my colleagues that if we do not preserve it in the Senate, it is gone. Our object should be to defeat the pending and other suggested amendments which reduce the number of Senators who can put cloture into effect. I am in favor of the Johnson resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, the Senator from Wyoming made a very wise remark a short time ago when he suggested that it is quite possible that some of the bills against which filibusters were directed were not good bills. I have heard frequent statements made indicating that filibusters are used against good bills only. I wish to read to the Senate two passages from the Constitution of the United States.

Article I, section 2, provides:

> The House of Representatives shall be composed of Members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature.

Then I should like to refer to the 17th amendment to the Constitution, which states, in connection with the election of Senators:

> The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislatures.

Under those two constitutional provisions the right to prescribe qualifications for voters rests in the legislatures of the States. Four of the filibusters which the able and distinguished Senator from New York has cited as justification for the adoption of a rule which would gag the Members of the Senate were filibusters against bills which were unconstitutional.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield an additional minute to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. ERVIN. Those bills were clearly unconstitutional under the two provisions of the Constitution to which I have referred—because they attempted to outlaw by Federal statute State laws prescribing poll taxes as a prerequisite to registering and voting. The Supreme Court of the United States held, in Breedlove against Suttles, in 1937, that such State laws are constitutional. In consequence, four of the eight so-called filibusters mentioned by the senior Senator from New York, in 1942, 1944, 1946, and 1948, were filibusters which occurred 11 years after the Supreme Court had held that if the bills which were filibustered against had been passed they would have been unconstitutional and in violation of two sections of the Constitution. In other words, four filibusters against civil rights bills were against bills which would have been unconstitutional if they had been passed. Therefore, all the proposed legislation which has been killed by filibusters has not been good legislation. Some of it was bad and unconstitutional.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I yield 10 minutes to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Before I make a few remarks of my own on the pending amendment, I should like to compliment the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] for what he has just said. He is getting this debate on the right track.

What is involved is really our system of free government, especially the principle of federalism which has served this country so well. I believe that many people confuse the issue or are confused by it because they use the analogy of a city council or club or small group, where there is no great diversity of opinion. That kind of reasoning applies quite properly to a small club or a city council or a fraternal group, but not to the U.S. Senate. What is involved is the integrity of the Federal system, of which the Senate is an integral and essential part. Anything which undermines the capacity and power of representatives of States in the Senate to bring about an agreement among the Members on vital issues undermines the Federal system. It is a remarkable fact that no great country in the history of the world, comparable to our own country, has ever been governed under a democratic system.

Every democratic society composed of many diverse elements generates within itself conflicts which have heretofore necessitated some kind of totalitarian system, some centralized dictatorship. I think the reason why this country has been served so well by the Federal system is that in the Senate the representatives of the States have been able to induce agreement upon issues which are of vital interest to the respective States.

I should like to remind the Senate and the country of a few simple observations on this subject which I think cannot be too often repeated. One which has been compelling to me since the time I was a university student is a quotation from De Tocqueville. I think we can all agree that De Tocqueville was one of the most astute observers of the American scene of more than 100 years ago. He said:

> If ever the free institutions of America are destroyed, that event may be attributed to the unlimited authority of the majority.

That particular quotation is, of course, more appropriate to the last amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], than it is to the amendment now under consideration. But I think the difference between the proposal of the Senator from Illinois requiring a vote of a bare majority of the membership of the Senate to invoke cloture, and the proposal requiring a vote of a three-fifths majority is not a significant one.

I should like to read a few excerpts from a recent article written by Mr. Walter Lippmann. I do not think anyone would deny that Mr. Lippmann is one of the most respected and most learned commentators on the American Government. He has been commenting on it longer and more consistently over the years, I think, than has almost anyone else.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that two of Mr. Lippmann's articles, published in the Washington Post and Times Herald of December 25, 1958, and January 6, 1959, be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Dec. 25, 1958]

MAJORITIES AND CIVIL RIGHTS

(By Walter Lippmann)

Having read carefully the material being circulated by Senator DOUGLAS, I have come to think that he has not dealth with the real issue. The real issue is not whether measures shall be fully debated. The question is how they can be passed. There is no doubt that 8 or 9 weeks of debate is quite sufficient for any measure, and that after that there is no hope of anybody's mind being changed by the debate itself. The real question is what are you to do with a minority which is not open to being converted by a debate. Under what conditions should you override it?

In my mind, the proposal to decide highly controversial questions by a vote of no more than one plus one-half of the Senate is not good enough. While the Constitution itself says nothing about the question, it is a fact that the Constitution is by no means devoted to the principle that a simple majority should rule. Treaties and impeachments require two-thirds of those present and voting. Constitutional amendments, the expulsion of Members, the overriding of the President's veto, require two-thirds of all the Senators elected. What is the reason for these exceptions to simple majority rule? Is it not that what is at stake is of such great moment that it should have the concurrence of more than half of the representatives of the States?

Why should it have this concurrence? Because when controversial matters are decided by a too narrow majority, the prospect of resistance and nullification is increased. To enforce difficult laws, there should be a very large majoriy which concurs in them.

* * * * *

In addition, we must not forget that majorities are not always liberal, and may indeed be quite tyrannical. It is a short view of history to equate simple majority rule, as does Senator DOUGLAS, with the defense of civil rights. He might ponder, for example, the case of President Truman's emergency strike legislation which proposed to break the railroad strike by drafting the railroad men into the Army. The House was stampeded into passing this bill 2 hours after the President's message by a vote of 306 to 13. But Senators Taft and Wagner held it up in the Senate, and after 6 days of debate its sponsors were compelled to omit the provisions for a draft.

That, too, was a civil rights case, and a very striking example of why simple majorities are not necessarily the guardians of civil rights.

[From the Washington Post, Jan. 6, 1959]

ARGUING WITH SENATOR DOUGLAS

(By Walter Lippmann)

With all due respect to Senator PAUL DOUGLAS, whom I admire very much, the question at issue in the Senate is not whether the majority shall rule. The question is what kind of majority shall rule. For there are many sorts of majorities.

Senator DOUGLAS wants 1 more than half of the Senators elected to rule, which would be 50 Senators. But on most of the business of the Senate 1 more than half of a quorum, which would be 26 votes, can pass a bill. Thus Senator DOUGLAS himself recognizes that on a question of closing debate, a bigger majority should be required than for ordinary legislation.

The present rules of the Senate require 66 Senators to close a debate, and excludes closure of a debate on a change in the rules. The Johnson-Knowland amendment, which will probably be adopted, requires a two-thirds majority of those present and voting, which can theoretically be as many as 66 and as few as 34, to close debate. Senator JOHN SHERMAN COOPER has now suggested that the majority be three-fifths, which would, theoretically, permit closure by as few as 30 Senators up to as many as 59 Senators, depending on how many Senators were present and voting.

Senator DOUGLAS is, therefore, begging the question when he talks as if majority rule were something simple and obvious to all men. Moreover, he ignores the nature of the Senate, which is the representative in our system of a federation of States. In the Senate, what does it mean to speak of majority rule? A majority of what? A majority of the States or a majority of the people of the United States?

In the House of Representatives the Members represent, more or less exactly, the voters themselves, and a Member from New York and a Member from Alaska or Nevada represents approximately the same number of people. But this is not true of the Senate.

Thus when Senator DOUGLAS wants 50 Senators to be able to close a debate and to pass a bill, he calls it majority rule which is the basic principle of our Government. But suppose the 50 Senators represent the 25 smallest States, do they represent a majority of the people of the United States? Taking the figures for the census of 1950, the 25 smallest States which have 50 Senators, represent about 29 million people or less than one-fifth of the population in 1950. Against these 25 States there were 3 States, New York, California, and Pennsylvania, which had 7 million more people in them than all the 25 combined.

The moral of all this is that in the Senate, majority rule is not something which all good men must favor and only reactionaries or worse can oppose. The question of what kind of majority shall prevail is one not of simple arithmetic or of absolute principle but of political wisdom.

For those of us who prefer the Johnson to the Douglas amendment of rule XXII, there are two outstanding considerations.

One, which refers to the civil rights of Negroes, is that we wish the Federal Government to proceed if not with the consent, then at least with the assent, of a large body of Southern opinion. We think that legislation which does not have at least the assent of the liberal South will prove to be unenforcible.

The other consideration which moves us is that we do not wish to entrust the civil liberties of all our people, not only under the 14th and 15th amendments but under the whole Bill of Rights, to simple and narrow majorities. We live in a time of danger when panic is always possible and panics can easily produce a stampede away from liberty.

The Johnson amendment to the rules, which requires at the most 66 votes to pass a controversial measure, is a reasonable rule. Legislation could be blocked by an unending filibuster only if all the Senators of 17 States participated in it. This would not, as some have suggested who side with Senator DOUGLAS, give the South an absolute veto on legislation to promote the civil rights of Negroes. In the Deep South there are only seven States in which there has been no desegregation at primary or secondary level and they have 14 Senators. In 10 other States of the South and the borderland there is some desegregation. All of these States would have to combine with the Deep South to impose a "veto."

Now legislation which is opposed by all the States of a whole section of the country, including the States which are beginning to comply with the new principle of desegregation, is very doubtful legislation indeed. It promises more trouble than anything else.

Presumably the Johnson amendment will be adopted, as Senator DOUGLAS himself forecast in his appearance on "Meet the Press" on Sunday evening. When it is adopted, it will not stop his long, persistent and invaluable labors on behalf of civil rights.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I desire to call attention to one or two points which Mr. Lippmann has written of in such a concise manner—points which I consider to be of paramount importance in this debate.

He says:

The choice will be between the Johnson and the Douglas proposals, and in all probability the Johnson proposal will prevail. The real issue at the bottom of this complicated argument about the rules of the Senate is, I believe, a constitutional question. It is not what the letter of the Constitution says. For it says nothing. It is about what is in accord with the spirit of the Constitution.

The question is how big a majority must there be in order to overrule the opposition of a determined minority. Rule XXII, as it now exists, says that 66 Senators must favor the legislation before a determined minority can be overruled. The Johnson proposal says that a determined minority can be overruled, in theory at least, by as few as 34 Senators. In practice, on a controversial measure there is, of course, likely to be a very full attendance.

The article continues:

The real issue is not whether measures shall be fully debated. The question is how they can be passed. There is no doubt that 8 or 9 weeks of debate is quite sufficient for any measure, and that after that there is no hope of anybody's mind being changed by the debate itself. The real question is what are you to do with a minority which is not open to being converted by a debate. Under what conditions should you override it?

Further in his article of December 25, 1958, Mr. Lippmann says:

In addition, we must not forget that majorities are not always liberal, and may indeed be quite tyrannical. It is a short view of history to equate simple majority rule, as does Senator DOUGLAS, with the defense of civil rights.

In his second article on this subject, which was published in the Washington Post of January 6, 1959, there is one outstanding paragraph which I think sums up what we are really concerned about. Mr. Lippmann says:

The moral of all this is that in the Senate, "majority rule" is not something which all good men must favor and only reactionaries or worse can oppose. The question of what kind of majority shall prevail is one not of simple arithmetic or of absolute principle but of political wisdom.

I submit that that paragraph really puts the question as it should be put. The real issue is the wisdom of changing our rules toward enabling a majority, whether it be a bare majority or a majority of three-fifths, to force a decision on a very large and important minority, when that minority is not willing to make any adjustment.

The truth of the matter is that in the issues which have been mentioned by the proponents of rules changes, in almost every case of any real significance, all that the filibuster did was to force a delay. Even the civil rights issue, which is still a current one, and which I had thought would have lost much of its political appeal after the passage of the bill in 1957—even in that case, under the most strenuous set of rules we have ever had, the existing rules of the Senate, the Senate passed a bill which went very far toward answering the complaints of the advocates of the rule changes.

So I return to the first point I made, namely, that what is involved is not the significance of a few votes one way or the other in defiance of the majority, but the wisdom of changing a basic principle of our Government, which up to now has required that the majority in the Senate find some adjustment or make some adjustment with any strong minority. That does not mean one person or two persons, but a substantial minority, such as is represented by the South. As Mr. Lippmann has so well pointed out, even though a majority could force a decision involving interests which this large segment of people believe to be of vital importance to them, simply because there happens to be a majority, whether it be a majority of one or three-fifths, or two-thirds, it would be an unwise political move.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I certainly hope the Senate will not accept this amendment.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I yield 3 minutes to the junior Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, much that has been said in advocacy of the Douglas amendment applies, it seems to me, with even greater force to the Morton amendment. Therefore, I support the Morton amendment as the road of moderation, as the desirable solution to be found somewhere between the two more extreme proposals.

In my opinion, the Johnson proposal makes very little difference in the rules of the Senate. I recognize that there was, certainly in the minds of many Senators, some merit in one argument advanced against the Douglas proposal, namely, that the action of Senators from 25 States having smaller populations might be operative in closing debate against the interests of States having very large populations. I recognize that there could well be some merit in that contention.

The Morton amendment, however, meets much more adequately this objection to which I have referred. Under the Morton amendment, if there were to be a coalition of States geographically, or States having the smaller populations, to secure something which States having greater populations, or constituting a larger area of the country, might oppose, it would require the action of the Senators from 30 States, less 1 Senator, to invoke cloture. The Morton amendment thus assures full deliberation, without the disadvantages of the more restrictive features of the Johnson resolution.

Time permits me to state only one of many reasons why I support the Morton amendment. It is moderate. It is reasonable. It is a fair solution. It is a compromise between the Douglas and the Johnson proposals. Therefore, I hope the Morton amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I will yield back the remainder of the time on this side if the Senator from Kentucky will do the same on his side.

Mr. MORTON. I am prepared to do so.

Mr. MANSFIELD. With the proviso that I may ask unanimous consent for a quorum call, and that after the quorum call has been completed, the Senate will proceed to vote on the Morton amendment.

Mr. MORTON. I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the acting majority leader? The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. MORTON], offered for himself and other Senators. All time on the amendment has been yielded back, the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ANDERSON (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES]. If he were present and voting he would vote "nay." If I were at liberty to vote I would vote "yea." I withhold my vote.

The rollcall was concluded.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER] is absent because of illness.

I further announce that on this vote the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER] is paired with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT]. If present and voting, the Senator from Oregon would vote "yea" and the Senator from South Dakota would vote "nay."

Mr. DIRKSEN. I announce that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] is absent on official business, and his pair has been previously announced by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON].

The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT] is absent on official business, and he is paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER]. If present and voting, the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT] would vote "nay" and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER] would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 36, nays 58, as follows:

So the amendment offered by Mr. MORTON for himself and other Senators was rejected.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON] to lay on the table the motion of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART] to reconsider.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution is open to amendment.

Mr. JAVITS and Mr. CASE of South Dakota addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York is recognized.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I call up my amendment and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 2, lines 2 and 3, it is proposed to strike out the words "as provided in these rules."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order so that the Senator from New York may be recognized and proceed so as to be heard. The Chair recognizes the Senator from New York. How much time does the Senator yield himself?

Mr. JAVITS. Ten minutes, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, may I have the attention of the majority leader?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York requests the attention of the majority leader.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, since I intend to raise, by the amendment, an important constitutional question, I should like to have the yeas and nays. I hope the majority leader will go along with me on that point. This is a question which should be decided before us in the most deliberate way.

I had hoped my colleague from New Jersey [Mr. CASE] would be present, to present his amendment to strike out this particular part of the resolution, but in his absence—though I am sure he will be back in a moment—I believe my amendment adequately brings up the point.

Mr. President, the purpose of my amendment is to carry out, in the effect of this resolution, essentially what was the advisory opinion of the Vice President when we began this debate.

It will be recalled that the fundamental question before us when we began the debate was whether or not the Senate, in a new Congress, could proceed to the adoption of rules, I held the view that the Senate could do so, while other Senators held the view that the Senate was bound by its preceding rules, and could proceed to the adoption of new rules only under the old rules.

The Vice President was faced with that question in a parliamentary inquiry, as he had been faced with it in 1957, and his opinion was a sort of compromise between the opposing views as to the Constitution. What he said, in practical effect, was that the rules of the Senate continue and carry over from one Congress to another, but that the Senate in a new Congress may proceed, at the opening, to seek to change its rules, and that if it does so, it then acts under constitutional procedure, rather than rules. The Constitution provides that each House may determine its own rules, and therefore no rule of a House which inhibits constitutional procedure would be permitted to stand in the way of the constitutional responsibility being carried out.

Furthermore, the Vice President stated that, in his opinion, if we proceed with debate on changes in the rules at the opening of a new Congress, and an effort is made to stop that debate, it can be done under normal parliamentary practice, which is to end debate by majority vote. We do not have to seek to end debate by cloture under the continuing rules of the Senate.

The Johnson resolution—and this is one point which has not been adequately discussed—purports only to continue the rules of the Senate from Congress to Congress. It so states in so many words. But it also purports to prevent us from changing the rules unless we comply with these rules. Let us read specifically the provision of section 2 of the Johnson resolution, with the change I propose to make. Section 2 reads:

> The rules of the Senate shall continue from one Congress to the next Congress unless they are changed, as provided in these rules.

By my amendment I seek to excise the words "as provided in these rules." Hence the section, if my amendment should prevail, would read as follows:

> The rules of the Senate shall continue from one Congress to the next Congress unless they are changed.

The physical situation would then be that we would attend the opening session of a new Congress, as we did the other day; and the rules of the Senate would be in effect, if my amendment were adopted, except that if an effort were made to amend the rules, that effort would be under constitutional safeguards of normal parliamentary procedure, rather than under these rules.

What the Johnson resolution seeks to do is to bind us to the very rules we have on the books now, as amended by the Johnson resolution. Hence, if we were to seek to amend the rules at the opening of the 87th Congress, according to the Johnson resolution we could not effect cloture except by a vote of two-thirds of those present and voting on any motion to change the rules, whereas if I am successful, and the Vice President's opinion is sustained—and that will be up to the majority in a succeeding Congress—debate on an amendment to the rules offered at the opening of a new Congress can be closed by majority vote under normal parliamentary practice.

That is the issue. Why is it so important? We know that this is a basic constitutional question, upon which the Vice President has taken a middle-of-the-road position. But his opinion is only an advisory opinion. In my view, if we adopt the Johnson resolution as it is written, we close the door on the Vice President's advisory opinion, so far as the point of view expressed by this Congress is concerned.

I also believe that, in all fairness, a new Congress could raise the question anew, and seek to decide it anew, and no one could stop it. We cannot amend the Constitution. No one knows that better than we. I think this is a constitutional question. But we pride ourselves on the fact that we have enough self-discipline and enough understanding of the law and the traditions of our country so that we will not consciously legislate what is unconstitutional. That is why I think it is so important that we record ourselves upon this fundamental issue, because this question is not only raised as an issue of constitutionality by me, but it has been raised as an issue by the second highest official of our Government, the Vice President, who has given an advisory opinion.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield.

Mr. HENNINGS. I have listened with great interest to the remarks of the distinguished Senator from New York. Is it not true that, irrespective of what the Johnson resolution undertakes to say, the Senate has control over the situation, insofar as the Constitution contemplates?

Mr. JAVITS. That is my belief.

Mr. HENNINGS. So it makes little or no difference, in practical effect—unless I be grossly in error—what we say in this resolution. Under the Constitution we can proceed, if we have the votes, at the next session of Congress to consider the rules. Of course, we know that we are stating something in the last paragraph which is a conclusion predicated upon a constitutional provision.

Mr. JAVITS. I agree with my colleague; but I do not agree with my own committee chairman that it is meaningless. On the contrary, I think what we do is very meaningful, for this reason: If we decide, by a vote, to legislate in accordance with the way this provision is written, the majority of the Senate will have rendered its judgment on the constitutional law opinion given to us by the Vice President. I agree with the Senator from Missouri that this language is not binding as a matter of law upon the next Congress, but I believe that many will take issue with that statement.

Mr. HENNINGS. I may have gone a little far when I said it was meaningless. I will say that it is without final force or effect. Does the Senator agree with that statement?

Mr. JAVITS. I thoroughly agree with the Senator, and that is why I think the language should be excised, because I do not believe a body so distinguished as this one should perform an act which is not only vain, but which is contrary to the Constitution of the United States.

I have examined the precedents. A point of order will not lie against this provision, not because it is constitutional—I firmly believe that it is not—but only because the precedents of the Senate say that the presiding officer is not to entertain a point of order against a provision of a measure merely because it is said to be unconstitutional. Therefore, the only way in which this question can be decided is by the self-discipline of Members of the Senate who will vote upon the question today. I believe that if we were to reverse the Vice President, it would establish a precedent which, it would be argued in the next Congress, was very important. I believe that at the very least the question should be left in its present condition, leaving it to a future Congress to deal with. Then, if some Member wishes to close debate by a majority vote, he can obtain a final ruling and a final determination by the Senate.

I hope my distinguished colleague, who is an outstanding and distinguished lawyer, will agree with me in the feeling that a body of the distinction of this body should not deprive itself of this opportunity to discipline itself, in a sense, in terms of the Constitution and the traditions of our country and, indeed, of the Senate itself.

Mr. HENNINGS. Let me say to my able friend from New York, who is a most distinguished lawyer in his own right, that it is an anomaly to have a provision such as this in legislation. Does he not agree with me?

Mr. JAVITS. It certainly is. It is most unusual.

Mr. HENNINGS. As we lawyers would say, it is a conclusion, is it not?

Mr. JAVITS. It certainly is. It is a conclusion of law.

Mr. HENNINGS. It is a conclusion of law. It is not a decision of fact, but a conclusion of law.

Mr. JAVITS. I thoroughly agree with the Senator. I believe that the language is inserted in the effort to use it as a determination in a future Congress, and that is an additional reason why I think it would be very much against the interests of the Senate and the country to allow it to remain in this particular resolution.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. It is my understanding that the Senator from New York takes the position that the following language of the Constitution means exactly what the words connote, and that the U.S. Senate does not possess any constitutional power to adopt rules of procedure which restrict the right granted to the Senate in this language:

> Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings.

Has the Senator heard what I have said?

Mr. JAVITS. I think I have heard everything the Senator has said so far. I will listen more closely.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate is not in order. It is difficult for Senators to understand distinctly questions which are asked.

The Senator may proceed.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Am I correct in that understanding?

Mr. JAVITS. Will the Senator repeat his question, please? I was trying to listen to two conversations at the same time.

Mr. LAUSCHE. As I understand, the Senator takes the position that the language of the Constitution conferring power upon the Senate to adopt its rules of proceedings means exactly what the language states. Is that correct?

Mr. JAVITS. Exactly.

Mr. LAUSCHE. That is, that each House must determine the rules of its proceedings, and therefore the Senate has the power to determine the rules of its proceedings.

Mr. JAVITS. Exactly.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Is that correct?

Mr. JAVITS. That is correct.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Therefore, any effort on the part of the Senate to impose restrictions upon future Senates in the establishment of its rules of proceedings is violative of the Constitution insofar as it tries to restrict future Senates in the adoption of rules?

Mr. JAVITS. That is exactly my argument.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Therefore, it is the opinion of the Senator from New York that to comply with that constitutional provision, all Senates in the future should be left unshackled in their power to adopt rules of procedures?

Mr. JAVITS. Exactly.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Because the moment this Senate attempts to impose restrictions upon future Senates, to that extent this Senate is usurping a power which resides only in the people of the United States, not in the Senators of the United States. Is that correct?

Mr. JAVITS. I thoroughly agree with my colleague except that I point out that the words should be "threatening to usurp" because under the Constitution of the United States I do not believe we can bind any future Senate. However these words in the Johnson resolution are presented to us in the hope and expectation that the future Congresses will consider themselves bound by the words of the proposed rule. Indeed I believe it is a damaging proposal because it will be considered a precedent for the next Congress. The Vice President has told us what he thinks. We have had the proposal made. The issue has been presented. It is an effort to do something which is unconstitutional. It is an effort to do it in such a way as not only to bind us but to bind all future Congresses. That is the reason for my amendment, and why I feel so strongly about it.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. May I have the opinion of the Senator from New York——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The 5 minutes which the Senator from New York has yielded to himself have expired.

Mr. JAVITS. I yield myself 10 additional minutes.

Mr. LAUSCHE. May I have the opinion of the Senator from New York on the following proposition? The language in the Constitution is that each House may determine the rules of its proceedings. It does not differentiate in any manner between the power conferred upon the House of Representatives and the power conferred upon the Senate. Is that correct?

Mr. JAVITS. That is correct.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I should like to ask the distinguished Senator upon what theory, in the face of this constitutional language can we differentiate between the proceedings followed in the House of Representatives and those in the Senate?

Mr. JAVITS. I know of no theory upon which we could differentiate. I believe, however, that it is argued on the basis of the Senate being a continuing body. The theory which is argued, in other words, is the theory of the continuing body concept. That concept is attributable primarily to the fact that two-thirds of the Members of the Senate carry over. Support for that theory appears in the ruling of the Supreme Court in the case of McGrain against Daugherty.

With respect to my amendment, I shall lay aside, as the Vice President laid aside in his advisory opinion, the whole question of the continuing body concept. The Vice President stated that it was not necessary to decide that question one way or the other. The fact is that there is a clear and precise constitutional mandate with respect to the adoption of rules.

Therefore the Senate has the right to proceed under the Constitution, rather than under its rules.

My argument on the motion is that, while we can abdicate in this Congress—which we would do by adopting the Johnson resolution—our constitutional right, by binding ourselves as to any rules until the opening of the next session, we certainly cannot constitutionally bind future Congresses. Therefore, if we cannot bind future Congresses, why set up a precedent in an effort to do something which we cannot do, but which will be used on another occasion, especially when we cannot justify it under the Constitution, and have no reason to? We do not try to do it with respect to anything else. We cannot foreclose future Congresses with respect to money bills or other legislation, and the Supreme Court has held we cannot do it. Why, if we cannot do it with respect to laws affecting the lives of individuals, for example, should we do it in terms of the rules of the Senate? It does not make any sense. I do not believe the Senate ought to do something that does not make any sense.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield.

Mr. HENNINGS. The Senator is well aware of the legal maxim that the law does not require the doing a useless thing. Is it the Senator's opinion that at any time during the present session of this Congress the Senate cannot amend its own rules?

Mr. JAVITS. It is my opinion that the Senate can amend its rules at any time.

Mr. HENNINGS. Irrespective of the proposed change?

Mr. JAVITS. No; I do not agree with that proposition. If we follow the advisory opinion of the Vice President, we are bound by the rules for the next 2 years.

Mr. HENNINGS. Does the Senator believe that the last paragraph under discussion is other than a conclusion and has no binding force and effect?

Mr. JAVITS. I thoroughly agree with the Senator that it does not.

Mr. HENNINGS. Why does the Senator believe it would inhibit the Senate from changing its own rules?

Mr. JAVITS. There is nothing in the discussion which inhibits the Senate from changing its rules. It can always change its rules if it can get to a vote. The question which we face is the question of getting to a vote.

We are a constitutional body until the end of 1960. We can guide ourselves to that extent, and we can restrict ourselves in certain ways. However, such action on our part is not binding on future Congresses. We can bind ourselves, but I do not see how we can go beyond that. The clear intent of the language of the proposal is to seek to take us into the authority of the next Congress. That we should not do.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield.

Mr. HENNINGS. With all due deference to the Senator from New York, I do not understand how the language in this conclusion, which pertains to a constitutional question and which is contained in legislation, would bind any future Congress.

Mr. JAVITS. I should like to say to the Senator from Missouri that I am really——

Mr. HENNINGS. This has no place in legislation.

Mr. JAVITS. I should like to say that I am being the devil's advocate, for this reason. I thought we could better hit the target in terms of a discussion if we laid aside the continuing body question and took the Vice President at his word, giving it really what is not the most liberal construction, but the most confining construction, which is adequate for the purpose of our discussion. I certainly cannot see anything to a proposition which is sought to be put into the law by a resolution which seeks to bind future Congresses.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Possibly the answer to the question propounded by the Senator from Missouri, would be found by considering the other part of the advisory opinion of the Vice President, namely, that if the question of rules adoption is once faced at the beginning of the session, then he will advise that the same right to consider the rules de novo would not exist during that Congress. That would be the reason why the same situation would not continue to prevail.

Mr. HENNINGS. May I ask the Senator to yield to me for an inquiry?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. If I am permitted to do so.

Mr. JAVITS. I shall be glad to yield for that purpose.

Mr. HENNINGS. May I make an inquiry of the Senator from South Dakota through the Senator from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. HENNINGS. Is it the Senator's opinion that the Senate cannot by its own vote undertake to set aside something which the Senate may do at this time, such as adopting a resolution which has an unconstitutional conclusion?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. It is my opinion that the Vice President advised the Senate that, in his opinion, the right to change or adopt new rules exists at the opening of a new Congress, not thereafter.

Mr. HENNINGS. We can adopt new rules at any time, if we have the votes. Is that correct?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. That is correct. I certainly believe that to be so.

Mr. HENNINGS. Any opinion of the Vice President to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. But the provision for the adoption or the changing of rules after that initial facing of the question would exist under the rules of the Senate. If I may ask another question of the Senator from New York——

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Before the Senator leaves that point, I should like to ask him with respect to his statement "if we have the votes." He agreed with the Senator from Missouri on that point. May I inquire how many votes? Is it by a majority or two-thirds, or by what standard?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. By a majority vote, I would say.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. On what basis does the Senator say a majority vote rather than a two-thirds vote?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. That is as I understood the opinion of the Vice President, as it was given, that the question could be considered de novo by a majority vote. If a resolution to change the rules were brought before the Senate by a committee report, it would be subject to adoption by a majority vote.

Why did the able Senator from New York propose to put the period after the word "change"? Why did he not put it after "next Congress"? It seems to me that the language which would be left would be susceptible of two interpretations. It could be said that obviously the rules continue unless they are changed. Suppose the period were to be placed after the word "Congress," so that the sentence would read:

The rules of the Senate shall continue from one Congress to the next Congress.

Mr. JAVITS. I amend my amendment to that effect, so that it will now read to strike out, on page 2, line 2, the words "unless they are changed as provided in these rules." The period will appear after the word "Congress" in line 2. I accept that suggestion. I think it is better English.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has the privilege of modifying his amendment without unanimous consent.

Mr. JAVITS. I did not ask for unanimous consent. I thank the Presiding Officer.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. I wholly support the amendment of the Senator from New York. As a matter of fact, it is my intention, whether his amendment shall be adopted or not, to offer a further amendment after the disposition of his amendment, to strike out all of section 3 of the Johnson resolution. But certainly I agree that the action which is proposed to be taken by the amendment of the Senator from New York is an utterly desirable one.

I would like to ask the Senator from New York a question as to the meaning of the language of section 3. Specifically, my question is this: The new paragraph which section 3 would add reads as follows:

The rules of the Senate shall continue from one Congress to the next Congress unless they are changed as provided in these rules.

Is it intended, by that language, in the opinion of the Senator from New York, that the rules shall continue up to the convening of a new Congress and then end, or that they shall continue on and on until they are changed?

Mr. JAVITS. I can only answer my colleague in terms of my purpose in making the amendment. It was my purpose to put into law the ruling of the Vice President; that is, the advisory opinion of the Vice President. As I understand that opinion, it is that when a new Senate convenes it convenes under the old rules. But it has a new and a different right under the Constitution to change the rules at that point. That is a right new and different from what it would have intervening between the opening of Congress and the end of a particular Congress.

So the answer, I think, to my colleague would be that on the convening of the Senate in a new Congress the same rules would still be the rules of the Senate, except that the way to change them would be under the Constitution rather than under the rules themselves.

I believe very deeply that this amendment should be adopted in order not to commit us to a proposition which is contrary to at least the immoral proposition I have described.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. I agree that the Senator from New York has correctly stated, as I understand them, the views which the Vice President expressed so well on this point at the opening of the last session of Congress. I think the Senator from New York is undoubtedly right as to the intent of the proponents of the resolution, because it seems to me that their intention undoubtedly is that the rules shall continue on and on and on, forever, unless they are changed, as their language reads in the resolution, "as provided in these rules,"—that is, in the rules themselves.

Based upon that view, I shall, as I said before, move to strike the whole section, because it is not in accordance with my view as to the way the rules of the Senate should remain in existence.

Whether or not this is so, the amendment of the Senator from New York must be made, because as a matter affecting the dignity of the Senate and the common sense of the situation, for the Senate to incorporate into its rules something which cannot be defended upon constitutional grounds and which cannot have any effect, would be an utterly wrong action.

I do not have any doubt, even if this provision should not be changed, and the resolution of the Senator from Texas should be adopted without any change, that at the beginning of a new session it would be in order for Senators to propose amendments to the rules of the Senate or to propose new rules.

There is nothing the Senate can do which can change the constitutional rights of the next Senate. It is the height of absurdity for us to purport to bind the next Senate. The Senator from New York is right in attempting to strike the language which his amendment would strike from the resolution.

Mr. JAVITS. I thank the Senator from New Jersey for his support. I admire him not only as a colleague, but also as a distinguished lawyer. It makes me very happy to know that he agrees with my legal concept of what is involved here.

Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York will state it.

Mr. JAVITS. How much time have I remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The senior Senator from New York has consumed 30 minutes.

Mr. JAVITS. May I inquire of the majority leader, through the Chair, whether the same practice will be followed in respect to this amendment as has been followed previously; namely, that there will be a quorum call before the vote, without the time for the quorum call being charged to my time?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The Senator is correct.

Mr. JAVITS. I thank the majority leader.

Mr. President, I yield myself an additional 10 minutes, and I now yield to my friend, the senior Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, I should like to address a question to the Senator from New York. When the Senate defeated the Anderson motion, in my judgment it simply made a policy decision that at that time it would not take up the question of new rules. Does the Senator from New York not consider the language of the Johnson resolution to be perhaps much more restrictive than the Anderson motion? The purpose of the Johnson resolution, as I understand, is to impose on the Senate of 1961 the present rules, including rule XXII, and whatever inhibitions may be placed in rule XXII at this session.

Mr. JAVITS. I thoroughly agree with the Senator from Kentucky. I am delighted that he made the point. The Anderson motion was complicated with Pandora's box questions of the possibility of other amendments to other rules, the whole concept of the idea of a continuing body, and the sharp separation of the Senate of one Congress from the Senate of the next Congress.

The question which I present to the Senate is exactly as the Senator from Kentucky has stated it, completely uncomplicated by all the other considerations. It concerns simply the narrow question whether we should attempt—I emphasize the word "attempt"—to bind future Senates on the question of rules. As a matter of fact, it seems to me that any constitutional lawyer should know that we cannot bind future Congresses in any way. We cannot bind future Vice Presidents either. We know that under the Constitution. We know, in all honesty, that under the Constitution we cannot and, indeed, have no right to do that, although we may try to prejudice them. That is exactly my point. I do not think we ought to try to do that. I think we ought to have enough self-discipline. I say that even to the majority. We have heard much to the effect that we are trying to liberalize the rules, and if we liberalize them it will work to our disadvantage some day. I say the same thing to the majority, which has had its will so far in respect to this matter: Do not jeopardize your situation, in your zeal and enthusiasm, because it may come back to haunt you one day, because you have done it yourself.

Mr. COOPER. I agree that even if this language is allowed to remain in the resolution, we cannot inhibit the constitutional right of the Senate in 1961. Would the Senator agree, and this seems to be the purpose of the language, that the distinguished majority leader is trying to get the Senate to say at this time that when this question arises in 1961, the position has at least been stated, and it has been foreclosed in advance? It seems to me that that is his purpose. I do not think it would have any legal or constitutional effect, but certainly it might have some psychological effect.

Mr. JAVITS. I thoroughly agree with the Senator from Kentucky, except that I think we can hear echoing in this Chamber what will be argued the next time this matter comes up at the beginning of a Congress. It will be said that the 86th Congress considered the whole matter. The Vice President gave an advisory opinion, and the 86th Congress made up its mind that this is a precedent of the Senate, and it is a precedent by which the next Congress should be bound.

I say we should not, indeed, we dare not, in all constitutional fairness, and I say this to the majority, which has been triumphant throughout the whole debate, we dare not in all constitutional fairness try to do this thing ourselves, when we know we should not do it.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield.

Mr. CHURCH. First, I concur in what the distinguished Senator from New York has said concerning the inability of this Senate to bind any future Senate, regardless of what determination is made on the pending amendment.

Would the Senator from New York agree with me that if the amendment he proposes is adopted or is rejected, the effect of that determination will be to establish a precedent one way or the other? In other words, is it not true that we now face a situation where, as a matter of fact, a precedent one way or the other automatically follows our vote?

Mr. JAVITS. In my opinion, the word "precedent" has to be construed in two ways. If the Senator asks me to agree with him that we are making a precedent, as we lawyers speak of a precedent, I say decidedly not, because we simply cannot make that kind of precedent in this kind of situation.

If the Senator suggests that we are giving our opinion as a whole Senate upon a subject which will be invoked as an opinion for the benefit of succeeding Senates, I say decidedly yes; and therefore, that is all the more reason for striking this language from the resolution, because we are wrong if we adopt it. I think we ought to know we are wrong, and we should not adopt it.

Mr. CHURCH. Within the latter sense I spoke of precedent in the inquiry I propounded to the Senator from New York. That being the case, does it not follow that, regardless of the fact that we cannot have any effect upon the constitutional powers which inhere in the Senate and nothing we do here can actually bind the hands of any future Senate, then, for such weight as the decision may have in the deliberations of a future Senate, does it not follow that we who prefer the two-thirds rule for invoking cloture best serve our cause by voting now in such a way as will be helpful in some future Senate to preserve that rule?

Mr. JAVITS. I do not think so, and I shall tell the Senator why. We are dealing with two separate questions. If I do nothing less than to make that clear in this debate, I shall be satisfied. I think we have been debating the whole question of the practicality of cloture and the protection of the right of the minority to speak. I do not think we have been dealing, except at the very inception of the debate, when the Vice President gave his advisory opinion, with the basic constitutional question involved. In my opinion, those who believe in the two-thirds provision are thinking along these lines: "Let us not go too fast. Let us handle this question wisely and slowly, in conformity with the fundamental precepts of our Government." If the majority so believes, it should vote with me, because I am contending for that. I am contending for the constitutional provision which is the safeguard of conservatism.

I cannot agree with my colleague that the two problems are in any way identical. To the contrary, I think they are completely dissimilar. Those who believe the strongest in the two-thirds provision should feel just as strongly about not allowing the Senate to purport to bind the hands of a future Senate, when it knows very well that, under the Constitution, the Senate has no such prerogative.

Mr. CHURCH. I appreciate the courtesies of the Senator from New York in answering my interrogatories. I wish to explain, only in a sentence, that we disagree about this matter, because I believe the two-thirds rule best serves the interests of my State and of my country. Therefore, I should like to safeguard it, without passing on the point that the constitutional powers of the Senate are affected one way or another.

Mr. JAVITS. If the Senator does not want to pass upon the point, he should vote for my amendment. My amendment does not pass on it, but leaves the Constitution as it is. However, the resolution as offered proposes to pass upon the question, and in a very dangerous and very inimical way in terms of danger to the country and power and control of the Senate.

Mr. President, if there are no other speakers who wish to be heard, I am prepared to yield back——

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, is there any Senator who is assigning time against the amendment?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yes. Does the Senator desire some time? We are ready to vote on the amendment, unless the Senator wishes to have time to discuss it.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I should like to discuss it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield the Senator from Wyoming 5 minutes.

VICE PRESIDENT'S POWERS ARE LIMITED

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I have been utterly unable to follow the arguments which have been presented throughout the debate to the effect that the Senate must, under the Constitution, adopt rules at the beginning of every Congress. There is not a line in the Constitution to that effect. I am also utterly unable to understand how anybody can argue that the Vice President of the United States has any constitutional power to declare unconstitutional a rule which the Senate may make.

CONSTITUTION AUTHORIZES SENATE TO WRITE ITS OWN RULES

The Constitution is clear. It is very simple. Nobody can misunderstand it.

Section 5 of article I provides:

Each House may determine the Rules of its Proceedings—

That is all it says about making of the rules. The authority is granted to the Senate and to the House to make their rules and to no other branch or official of the Government.

The Senator from New York offers an amendment to the pending resolution offered by the leadership for both sides to make paragraph 2 of section 3 of the pending resolution read as follows:

The rules of the Senate shall continue from one Congress to the next Congress unless they are changed.

The Senator from New York wants to strike out the words "as provided in these rules."

VICE PRESIDENT HAS NO AUTHORITY TO DECLARE RULES UNCONSTITUTIONAL

The Constitution of the United States, in the clause I have just read, gives to the Senate the right to write its rules. Who is it that has the right to prevent the Senate from writing its rules? It is said the Vice President has that right. I interrogated the Vice President a few days ago, in an effort to discover upon what basis he claimed this authority. I have been unable to find such authority in the Constitution and he has been unable to hand it down.

Of course, he made the ruling in a previous Congress, say those who claim that the Vice President has the right to declare a rule of the Senate to be unconstitutional. But it is impossible to find constitutional support for such a provision.

THESE ARE CONSTITUTIONAL DUTIES OF VICE PRESIDENT

Who is the Vice President? His office was created by the Constitutional Convention when the Founders were creating the Presidency. It was set forth in the Constitution that in the electoral college, when the votes were counted, the man who had the second largest vote for the Presidency should become Vice President. That was changed, of course, when it was provided by amendment that nominations should be made for Vice President as well as for President. But in the section which creates the Vice Presidency we find a clause which prescribes his duty. This is paragraph 5 of section 1 of article II of the Constitution:

In case of the Removal of the President from Office, or of his Death, Resignation, or Inability to discharge the Powers and Duties of the said Office, the same shall devolve on the Vice President, and the Congress may by Law provide for the Case of Removal, Death, Resignation or Inability, both of the President and Vice President, declaring what Officer shall then act as President, and such Officer shall act accordingly, until the Disability be removed, or a President shall be elected.

Having proceeded that far, the constitutional fathers, having found no duty for the Vice President to perform, decided they would make him President of the Senate. This is the only other clause of the Constitution I can find referring to the Vice President.

The Vice President of the United States shall be President of the Senate, but shall have no Vote, unless they be equally divided.

That means that he may enforce the rules the Senate makes for itself. He cannot alter them. He cannot hold them unconstitutional.

VICE PRESIDENT HAS NO POWER OVER MAKING OF RULES

I find no word or phrase or clause in this provision saying that "the Vice President may give advisory opinions to prevent the Senate from exercising its constitutional powers to make its rules."

Can anybody point out such powers? Can anybody point to any provision in the Constitution which gives the Vice President authority to render the decision the present Vice President did when he assumed the right to find some rule already made by the Senate to be unconstitutional?

The Constitution does not give that power to the Vice President. The Constitution gives to the Senate, and only the Senate, the power to make its rules. It does not say "shall"; it says "may." It does not say "why." Why was it the Constitution provided that each House may make its own rules?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired. Does the Senator wish to yield himself additional time?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield myself 3 more minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is recognized for 3 more minutes.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The reason why the constitutional fathers said "may" instead of "shall" was that they realized the various legislatures of the various States had followed different rules of procedure; that the British Parliament had rules. Of course, Thomas Jefferson, as Vice President, prepared a very extensive and clear compendium of the British rules of procedure in Parliament. But when the Vice President rendered his advisory opinion, this is what he said:

Any provision of Senate rules adopted in a previous Congress which has the express or practical effect of denying the majority of the Senate in a new Congress the right to adopt rules under which it desires to proceed is, in the opinion of this Chair, unconstitutional. It is also the opinion of the Chair that section 3 of rule XXII in practice has such an effect.

IS OPPOSED TO FILIBUSTERS

I have always been against section 3 of rule XXII. I was reported the other day by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON] as being one of the 10 listed Senators who were against exempting the rulemaking power from rule XXII, as brought in by former Senator Wherry, so I am a liberal against filibusters without any question.

What is the alternative? If we do not use the practical rules which the Senate itself has developed through the years, what are we going to use?

SOME GENERAL PARLIAMENTARY RULES ENDANGER FREE SPEECH

Some of those who have participated in the argument against the Johnson resolution have said that the Senate should then, at the beginning of the new Congress, proceed under general parliamentary rules. Some of those general parliamentary rules include the right to move the previous question, whereby a majority of one of a quorum could act. The rule of the previous question was abolished years ago by the Senate of the United States, because it wanted to make this Chamber a forum of free speech to protect the people of the United States.

There is not a line in the Constitution, Mr. President, which sustains the assumption made by the present Vice President, the President of the Senate, that he can rule unconstitutional a rule adopted by the Senate.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I am glad to yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Wyoming has again expired.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield myself 3 additional minutes, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is recognized for 3 additional minutes.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I should like to ask the Senator from Wyoming where he finds in the Constitution any language which gives the right to one Senate to restrict a succeeding Senate in the exercise of the absolute grant of power in the making of rules of procedure.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I find none, and there is none in the Johnson resolution.

Mr. LAUSCHE. It is my belief that under the Constitution the words dealing with this question are simple, direct, and plain. They are, "Each House may establish——"

Mr. O'MAHONEY. May "determine."

Mr. LAUSCHE. I think it is "may establish."

Mr. O'MAHONEY. No. The Constitution provides, "Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings."

Mr. LAUSCHE. Very well. That is a plain, direct, unrestricted, and unconditioned grant of power.

SENATE MAY MAKE RULES AT ANY TIME

Mr. O'MAHONEY. It does not say that shall be done at the beginning of a Congress. It does not say when it may be done or when it should not be done, but the Vice President attempts to tell us when it may not be done.

Mr. LAUSCHE. If it is an unconditional grant of power, may I ask the Senator from Wyoming on what theory one Senate can impose restrictions upon future Senates in the adoption of rules of procedure.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. It cannot. It cannot at all. Nothing in the resolution attempts to do that. My interpretation of the resolution is that it merely states the rules of the Senate shall continue until they are changed.

Mr. LAUSCHE. No.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. In accordance with the Constitution. Otherwise, every single one of the arguments which are made in support of the Anderson motion in the first place, and in support of the other proposals to amend the Johnson resolution is based upon the conception that the rules of parliamentary procedure instead of the rules of the Senate shall govern every future Senate. I, for one, say the Vice President has no right to tell the next Senate, "You will have to proceed under 'Robert's Rules of Order' instead of under rules adopted by the Senate itself and kept in effect for so long a period of time."

Mr. LAUSCHE. I am very thankful for the Senator's opinion to the effect that there is nothing in the Constitution which grants this Senate or any other Senate the power to impose restrictions on future Senates in respect to the adoption of rules of procedure. I have one further question to ask.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. May I say, first, before the Senator propounds the next question, I am speaking against the amendment offered by the senior Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS], which seeks to amend the pending resolution by striking out on page 2 the words "as provided in these rules" and leaving the words "The rules of the Senate shall continue from one Congress to the next Congress unless they are changed."

Mr. LAUSCHE. I think the Senator from New York is indulging in the request for the adoption of a resolution which merely declares what the Constitution says, but I think he is correct in asking for that in the face of the construction which has been placed upon the provision by other Senators.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. This is no law.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I am happy to yield.

Mr. ERVIN. I should like to ask the able and distinguished Senator from Wyoming if the Constitution itself gives the Senate unrestricted power to determine rules of its proceedings.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Of course it does. There is no restriction, but the Vice President would impose a restriction.

Mr. ERVIN. That is correct. I will ask the Senator from Wyoming if the amendment does not propose to amend the Constitution?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I beg the Senator's pardon; which amendment?

Mr. ERVIN. The amendment offered by the Senator from New York. I ask the Senator if the amendment does not, in effect, propose to do as follows: Whereas the Constitution says that each House may determine the rules of its proceedings the amendment offered by the Senator from New York proposes to say, "Provided, however, the Senate cannot adopt any rules relating to how the rules are to be amended."

Mr. O'MAHONEY. That seems to be what the Senator from New York is proposing.

Mr. ERVIN. We now have two rules in existence prescribing exactly how rules may be amended. The first provides a Senator may submit a resolution proposing to amend the rules, which can be referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration. The other provides that a Senator can give notice under rule XL that he is going to call up a proposed amendment to the rules. There is certainly no inconsistency between either of those rules and the Constitution, is there?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The rules are perfectly consistent. In my thinking the rules are better than "Robert's Rules of Order" for the operation of the Senate, particularly since the Senate has complete power to change the rules whenever it so decides.

Mr. ERVIN. I will ask the Senator one other question——

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ERVIN. Does the proposed amendment not say, in effect, that when the Senate attempts to amend the rules it must emulate the example set by the mule of Josh Billings which, according to Josh Billings, "didn't kick according to no rule." [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, the Senator from New Jersey asked me to yield. May I ask the Senator to ask the question on his own time, and then I shall attempt to answer.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I yield 3 minutes to the Senator from New Jersey.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. CASE] is recognized for 3 minutes.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I have no desire to take up time, except to make an inquiry of the Senator from Wyoming. I should merely like to secure classification of the Senator's views about section 3.

Am I correct in my understanding that the Senator from Wyoming does not believe the rules of one Senate can bind the next Senate?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Of course not. The Senate can make rules at any time; any week, any month, any day. We could spend the whole session talking about changing the rules, and do it in the next Congress, too.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. So it is not possible for a provision of rules adopted in the present Congress to bind the Senate of the next Congress?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Absolutely not.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. I propose to offer an amendment, following the disposition of the pending amendment, to strike out all of section 3. If such an amendment is offered will the Senator from Wyoming be disposed to support it?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. No, I will not be disposed to support such an amendment, because I am supporting the Johnson resolution in order to prevent future Senates of the United States from being tied up at the beginning of the Congress with debates on the floor about the rules. The proposals should be sent to the Committee on Rules and Administration, where such changes could be considered and, if need be, subsequently made in order.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. I should like to ask one further question. I think I understand the Senator's position. Though I disagree with him, I respect his position highly, of course.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator is very kind.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Does the Senator from Wyoming feel his position requires him to support or oppose the amendment now pending, offered by the Senator from New York?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Yes.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Which is it? Does the Senator oppose it or support it?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I oppose the amendment offered by the Senator from New York.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. I thank the Senator.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois desires recognition. Does the Senator from New York yield time to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. JAVITS. I shall be glad to yield 1 minute to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I will need only a half minute, Mr. President.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may suggest the absence of a quorum without the time necessary for the call of the roll being charged to either side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Illinois? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I believe that immediately after the disposition of my amendment, the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. CASE] will offer an amendment to strike all of section 3. In order to expedite the business of the Senate, I now ask for a vote on my amendment, which is to strike the words "unless they are changed as provided in these rules" on page 2 of the Johnson resolution, lines 4 and 5, and I ask that that vote be by a division.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield back the remainder of his time?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS] as modified. Without objection, the vote will be by a division.

On a division, the amendment of Mr. JAVITS, as modified, was rejected.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I offer an amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 1, beginning after line 9, it is proposed to strike out section 3, as follows:

> SEC. 3. Rule XXXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate is amended by inserting "1." immediately preceding "At", and by adding at the end thereof a new paragraph as follows:
> "2. The rules of the Senate shall continue from one Congress to the next Congress unless they are changed as provided in these rules."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. How much time does the Senator yield himself?

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. I yield myself 5 minutes. I shall be very brief in my presentation of this amendment.

The purpose of my amendment is to strike all of section 3 of the pending resolution. In other words, I would strike the new provision which would be added to the present Senate rules by the resolution. The language proposed to be stricken is as follows:

> The rules of the Senate shall continue from one Congress to the next Congress unless they are changed as provided in these rules.

The amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS], as modified, which was just defeated—unfortunately, in my view—would have struck from the sentence I have read the words "unless they are changed as provided in these rules." My amendment would strike the entire sentence, that is to say, all of section 3.

The arguments made so well by the Senator from New York and other Senators who supported his amendment apply equally to my amendment. In addition, in favor of my amendment is the consideration that the rules of the Senate do not continue indefinitely, but, in my view, must be adopted by the Senate in each new Congress, whether or not we place this language in the present rules of the Senate.

Many times in the past there has been no separate vote to adopt rules at the beginning of the first session of the Senate in a new Congress. Rather we have adopted the old rules by acquiescence. The fact that we have, by acquiescence, readopted or continued the old rules does not mean, however, that they continue in effect, or can continue in effect, when we do not acquiesce in such procedure. Certainly I and other Senators who have pressed for the adoption of new rules do not acquiesce in this instance. Nor can we acquiesce in the adoption of a provision which would attempt to freeze into the rules a contrary view.

I believe it is unnecessary to have extended debate on this section. Senators have long since made up their minds how they are going to vote. It seems to me that we should come to a vote. I hope the vote will be favorable.

If the other side has no use for time in opposition to my amendment, I am prepared to yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. I do not know what I could add to the constitutional arguments which have already been made in this body. I very much hope that our action will be carefully noted throughout the country by students of constitutional law.

I firmly believe that the Senator from New Jersey and I would be less than true to ourselves if we did not emphasize, by what we have attempted to do by these two amendments, the separation between the arguments as to what kind of cloture can be effected by the Senate, and by how many Senators, and the fundamental constitutional issues involved.

I think we are about to set a precedent which the Constitution does not entitle us to set, and which will be very inimical to the group which is the present majority in this Chamber on this issue.

Let me say to my colleague that this is the final opportunity to say a word with respect to the debate on this issue. Although we have not been successful in this instance, and although we may have lost this battle, I think we shall be successful in winning the war. More and more the country will begin to realize that the things for which we fought did not involve the question whether 50 or 60 Senators should have the power to close debate, but rather the entire climate of legislation, which will condition the action of the Senate for the next 2 years.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. I thank my colleague from New York. He is completely right. If we lose the vote on this amendment, as we have lost the vote on other proposals we have offered during the debate on this resolution, we shall have lost the battle, but we will not be the losers of the war.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. I yield.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I should like to make an observation. Personally, I believe that the pending resolution and the debate on it have been a useful contribution to the development of procedures in the Senate. I do not regard the pending resolution as a fruitless proposition. Not only does it involve a change from the requirement of a constitutional two-thirds to two-thirds of those present and voting, but I believe also that section 2 of the pending Johnson resolution is important. I doubt that it would have come up if the whole question had not been raised by those who have offered amendments which were not accepted, and those who have opposed the amendments. I would say that a constructive record will have been made if the Johnson amendment shall be adopted.

The second section of the resolution would make the rules on cloture applicable to changes proposed in the rules themselves. That is an exceedingly important change. I do not believe that Senators who have been responsible for raising the issue should feel that their endeavor has been wholly in vain. If cloture can be applied to a motion or resolution relating to the rules themselves, then something has been gained.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. I thank the Senator. I appreciate his generous remarks. At this time I have not determined whether the resolution, if unchanged, should be supported by me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. I yield myself 2 additional minutes.

As the Senator from South Dakota has pointed out, section 2 eliminates from the present rules of the Senate the provision which I regard not only as unwise and wrong, but also as unconstitutional. Since it is unconstitutional, we have not accomplished anything substantially if we delete it from the rules. To do so would be merely to confirm the constitutional provision.

The real question is whether the beneficient effect of section 2 of the resolution is not overshadowed by the malevolent effect of section 3.

It is just as bad to have an unconstitutional provision in rule XXXII as it is to have it in rule XXII. While I am reserving for the moment the question of my final action with respect to Resolution No. 5, if it is unchanged in all respects, I cannot be happy about the provisions which have not been amended in accordance with the proposal made by my colleagues and by myself during the debate.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, if the Senator from New Jersey is ready to yield back the remainder of his time, I shall do so also.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time for debate has been yielded back. All time for debate has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Does the Senator from New Jersey wish a division on his amendment?

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey calls for a division. The amendment will be read for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after line 9 on page 1.

The Senate proceeded to divide, and Senators favoring the amendment rose.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Is the Senate dividing on the pending amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A division is in process. The amendment has been read for the information of the Senate. Senators who have been counted will be seated. Those who oppose the amendment will rise and stand until counted.

On the division being completed, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, I desire to call up my amendment which is identified as "1–9–59—E."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add a new section, as follows:

2. During the consideration of a bill, resolution, or other matter which has been pending before the Senate for 1 week or more, it shall be in order to offer motions that the Senate proceed with the consideration of amendments, which motions shall be privileged and decided with not more than 1 hour of debate, to be equally divided between opponents and proponents.

"If such a motion shall be determined in the affirmative, any amendment thereafter offered, together with debate thereon, and all debate under the order for pending business shall be required to be germane to the subject matter before the Senate. All questions of relevancy under this rule, when raised, including appeals, shall be decided without debate."

Change the numbers of the succeeding paragraphs of the rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLAND in the chair). The Senate will be in order.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, I yield 1 minute to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, on March 11, 1949, I stated my position on rule XXII and again today I reiterate the stand that I took 10 years ago. I was then and I am now unalterably opposed to any limitation of debate in the U.S. Senate, the only legislative body left in the world where a legislator can freely debate the merits and demerits of all issues.

On November 21, 1958, I forwarded a letter to the 97 Senators who are the present Members of the U.S. Senate pointing out briefly my reasons for not changing rule XXII and sending them certain references from Senators who have spoken on this subject as far back as 1841.

For the information of the Members of the Senate, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of my letter be inserted at this point in the RECORD and also a copy of my remarks made on the subject on March 11, 1949; the remarks of the late Senator Robert La Follette given on March 8, 1917, and exhibits; and several selected quotations from Senators on the subject of unlimited debate made on the Senate floor January 22, 1891, in which they quoted Senators who spoke on the same subject on July 15, 1841.

Mr. President, the purpose of my inserting these quotations in the RECORD is to prove the point that the need for unlimited debate is just as strong today as it was in 1949, 1917, 1891, and 1841.

Mr. President, there have been references by the spokesmen for the Douglas-Humphrey-Javits-Case amendment to rule XXII that under the amendment there will be ample time for debate on any issue before debate will be terminated stating that there must be at least 15 days of debate before a majority of 50 Senators can cut off debate. However, Mr. President, if this amendment should pass and the protection now afforded under rule XXII will no longer be in effect, then the amendment offered by Senators DOUGLAS, HUMPHREY, JAVITS, and CASE can be further amended so that a majority of 50 or less Senators can limit debate after 5 days or 1 day or even one-half day of debate on any given issue.

In conclusion, for the reasons I have cited herein, my firm position is that there should be no change at all in rule XXII and that the power of unlimited debate should continue.

There being no objection, the documents were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NOVEMBER 21, 1958.

DEAR SENATOR: I have been advised that another effort will be made to change rule XXII when the 86th Congress convenes.

After 18 years experience in the U.S. Senate, I am unalterably opposed to limiting debate in the Senate, the one place left in this world for free and untrammeled discussion. My views upon this have been stated so often on the Senate floor that it is not necessary for me to fully restate them here.

Don't you think it mighty strange when oldtimers like Bob La Follette and Charles McNary and men of their fine type totally rejected the limitation of debate that some Senators on the pretext of passing some civil rights bill, are going to give those opposed to liberal legislation the chance to wreck the passage of liberal bills. As Senator McNary so well stated, "A good bill has never been killed by a filibuster, but many a bad bill has been prevented from becoming a law by a few fighting liberals."

To go back even further into the history of unlimited debate in the Senate, I quote Senator Harris of Tennessee, who, in 1891, stated as follows: "So I assert with absolute confidence that from the 26th day of March 1806, there has been no proposition to limit general debate in the Senate that has not been rebuked as an attack upon free speech and upon the rights of the States and the people and dangerous to well-considered legislation as well as to civil liberty. They have been, as they ought to have been, invariably defeated."

It is interesting to note from Senator Harris' quotation that unlimited debate is most necessary to protect our civil liberty, whereas today the proponents of the change of rule XXII would destroy that protection to civil liberties just because they feel that a civil rights bill cannot pass under existing rule XXII.

I would like to reiterate what I said on the Senate floor on March 11, 1949, in discussing rule XXII when I stated, "I wish to say that during the 8 years I have been here, I have voted for every bill, without exception, calling for the establishment of civil rights in this country. So, today, I wish to make it very plain that I vote to override the decision of the Vice President, I am still a firm, fighting friend of civil rights—just as strong a friend of civil rights as I ever was; and if the Democrats will begin tomorrow or Monday with a really serious effort to carry out Mr. Truman's civil-rights program, I assure my friend the distinguished majority leader [Mr. Lucas] that he will find me voting with him every single time. I hope the Democratic Party will do that. I hope they begin on it right away, and never quit until they secure the enactment of that civil-rights program. I think they will receive a great deal of support from Senators on this side of the aisle."

I believe that we, the Members of the Senate can best understand the great need to have complete debate on the Senate floor if we would study the speeches of our predecessors in office. For example, read the speech of Senator La Follette of March 8, 1917, beginning on page 40 in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in which he also quotes from Senator George Gray (Delaware); Senator John Coit Spooner (Wisconsin); Senator Henry Moore Teller (Colorado) who spoke on this subject on the 22d day of January 1891. Speeches by other distinguished Senators, can be found in volume 116 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 51st Congress, 2d session, beginning on page 1670 and running through pages 1740, where, in 1841, many distinguished Senators from all sections of the country expressed the great need for unlimited debate.

In closing, I regret to see such fine men as the proponents for a change of Senate rule XXII deceiving themselves in doing something, which if they succeed, I believe they will live to regret.

With kindest regards, I am,

Sincerely yours,

WILLIAM LANGER.

[From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Mar. 11, 1949]

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, very briefly I want to state my position on this motion. In the 80th Congress I led the fight to have the Republican Party carry out its pledges. The Republican Party at that time did not do so. On June 7, 1948, I brought to the attention of the Senate that in the Republican platform of 1944 the Republicans had placed the following planks. First:

"We pledge the establishment by Federal legislation of a permanent Fair Employment Practice Commission."

Second:

"ANTIPOLL TAX

"The payment of any poll tax should not be a condition of voting in Federal elections and we favor immediate submission of a constitutional amendment for its abolition."

Third:

"ANTILYNCHING

"We favor legislation against lynching and pledge our sincere efforts in behalf of its early enactment."

And, Mr. President, fourth:

"INDIANS

"We pledge an immediate, just, and final settlement of all Indian claims between the Government and the Indian citizenship of the Nation. We will take politics out of the administration of Indian affairs."

Mr. President, day after day I stood upon this floor, when the Republicans had a majority, begging them to carry out the solemn promises, the definite pledges they had made to the people of the United States, and it is significant to note that I got exactly 7 votes on 3 of the measures, and that only 1 of them was passed.

Mr. President, if I were assured that after this appeal had been decided my colleagues on the other side would make a sincere effort to carry out the wishes of President Truman, I would not take the few minutes I am taking. I have a definite idea as to their intentions. I wish to make perfectly clear the reason why I shall vote to overrule the decision of the Vice President yesterday afternoon.

In the first place, North Dakota holds a rather peculiar distinction. At the time rule XXII was adopted that grand and popular Viking, the late Senator Gronna, of North Dakota, was 1 of 3 Senators to vote against it. Also at that time there was in the Senate a man who was beloved all over the country, and particularly by the people of North Dakota. I refer to the late Senator Robert La Follette, Sr., one of the fighting champions—and one of the greatest—in behalf of the common people. Mr. La Follette was elected to the Senate in 1905. Because he had a lieutenant governor who disagreed with him politically, he waited until 1906 before he came to the Senate. In 1917, 11 long years after Mr. La Follette first became a Member of this body, the question of cloture came up.

Mr. President, I believe that no other question which has arisen in the Senate during the 8 years I have been a Member has resulted in my receiving more telegrams and more telephone calls than I have received in this case, after announcing a few days ago that I would vote not to sustain the anticipated ruling of the Vice President.

In order that my position may be very clear, I wish to say that I fully agree with the late Robert La Follette, Sr. On March 8, 1917, in speaking of rule XXII, just before the vote took place, Mr. La Follette said:

"With a rule such as is here proposed in force at that time, with an iron hand laid upon this body from outside, with a Congress that in 3 years has reduced itself to little more than a rubber stamp, let me ask you, Mr. President, if you do not think a rule of this sort would be bound to be pretty effective cloture? Especially is that true as some of the proposed legislation was of a character that appealed to certain Senators upon this side of the Chamber who, coming from States where the manufacture of munitions is a mighty important industry, are impressed with legislation that benefits the interests they represent?"

Mr. La Follette continued—and I invite this to the attention of every man who pretends to be a progressive. Everyone who has studied history knows that Rome, after 450 fine years, fell when Julius Caesar made himself a dictator and when he subjugated the Roman Senate to his will. The English Parliament was strong for many hundred years, until Gladstone succeeded in abolishing the right of free discussion, at the time when the matter of freedom for Ireland came up for debate in Parliament.

I read at this time what Senator La Follette said when a proposal for cloture was before the Senate 32 years ago:

"Mr. President, believing that I stand for democracy, for the liberties of the people of this country, for the perpetuation of our free institutions, I shall stand while I am a Member of this body against any cloture that denies free and unlimited debate. Sir, the moment that the majority imposes the restriction contained in the pending rule upon this body, that moment you will have dealt a blow to liberty, you will have broken down one of the greatest weapons against wrong and oppression that the Members of this body possess. This Senate is the only place in our system where, no matter what may be the organized power behind any measure to rush its consideration and to compel its adoption, there is a chance to be heard, where there is opportunity to speak at length, and where, if need be, under the Constitution of our country and the rules as they stand today, the constitutional right is reposed in a Member of this body to halt a Congress or a session on a piece of legislation which may undermine the liberties of the people and be in violation of the Constitution which Senators have sworn to support. When you take that power away from the Members of this body, you let loose in a democracy forces that in the end will be heard elsewhere, if not here."

I have not time to quote all of Mr. La Follette's speech. He gave one or two quotations. Here is one from a former Senator from Indiana, Senator Turpie, who, some 50 years previously, had made a statement in regard to limitation of debate. This is what Senator Turpie said:

"I heard this body characterized the other day as a voting body. I disclam that epithet very distinctly. I have heard it described elsewhere as a debating body. I disclaim that with equal disfavor. This body is best determined by its principal characteristic. The universal law and genius of language have given a name to this body derived from its principal attribute. It is a deliberative body—the greatest deliberative body in the world."

That was the first time, so far as I have been able to ascertain, that that description of the United States Senate was given. He continued:

"Now, voting is an incident to deliberation, and debate is an incident to deliberation; but when a body is chiefly characterized as deliberative there is much deliberation apart from discussion and debate, and wholly apart from what is called the business of voting.

"The essence and the spirit of a body like ours, now over a century old, may be best gathered from its rules of action, the body of law governing it always very small, now very brief. Of the 21 rules properly affecting parliamentary procedure in this body 11 relate to the subject of deliberation. More than one-half relate exclusively to that subject and have nothing to do with debate or voting. I suppose that the form of law under which the will of the majority must control this body embraces at least the rules which govern us. Here is rule XXII, one which touches us every day. I think it is the most frequently operative of any rule in the Senate."

Mr. President, after referring to the pledges made by the Republican Party, which they did not keep, I now call attention to the Democratic Party—whose members now say that they stand for civil rights. Mr. Truman was a member of this body for 5 years. What does the cold record show as to what he did for civil rights? Did he lead any fight for them in this body, Mr. President? I was here during those 5 years. He did not lead one fight for them. Where is he today? He is not in Washington. Mr. President, he is out fishing, in Florida. That shows his great interest in this matter.

O Mr. President, these Negro votes are very fine on election day. Apparently the Democrats think they have to make a showing for civil rights this year and perhaps next year and perhaps the year after that—but not a serious effort to get these civil-rights measures enacted; and the effort here these past 10 days has not been serious.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. LANGER. I refuse to yield at this time; I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota declines to yield.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, the effort has not been serious. I imagine the Senator from Florida might give us some of Mr. Truman's votes on various measures. I think that he voted right when it came time to vote; but at no time did he lead a fight for civil rights.

Mr. President, what a difference. When two or three times at the last session I tried to prevent the passage of a bill which, under selective service, would draft the last remaining son of a family whose two other sons had been killed in the service, the Members of the Senate stayed here and had two sessions all night long—two long, long night sessions. But I have not seen any so far this session, Mr. President. So far in this session we have worked no later than 8 or 9 or 10 o'clock at night, and then we have quit until the next day at noon, not 11 o'clock. I, for one, want to make it very plain that at any time that the Democrats really want to pass these civil-rights measures, I am prepared to stay here all night or stay here a week or a month in order to enact the civil-rights program that Harry Truman has advocated since he has become President.

Not long ago the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. Ives] said he thought he was perhaps as good a friend of civil rights as was any other Senator upon this floor. I think he is correct. I wish to say that during the 8 years I have been here, I have voted for every bill, without exception, calling for the establishment of civil rights in this country. So, today, I wish to make it very plain that when I vote to override the decision of the Vice President, I am still a firm, fighting friend of civil rights—just as strong a friend of civil rights as I ever was; and if the Democrats will begin tomorrow or Monday with a really serious, honest effort to carry out Mr. Truman's civil-rights program, I assure my friend the distinguished majority leader [Mr. Lucas] that he will find me voting with him every single time. I hope the Democratic Party will do that. I hope they begin on it right away, and never quit until they secure the enactment of that civil-rights program. I think they will receive a great deal of support from Senators on this side of the aisle.

Mr. President, apropos of the telegrams and telephone calls on this matter which have been received by Senators—and two of those communications are rather threatening, especially one from New York—I wish to say that it seems to me that the people who sent those messages do not really understand the problem we face here, which was so clearly set forth today by the distinguished senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. Vandenberg].

Mr. President, in closing, let me say that when I came to the Senate I had no better friend than Senator Charles McNary, of Oregon, who at that time occupied the desk next to the one I now have in this Chamber. He was then the minority leader. I shall never forget when he said to me that in his judgment one of the greatest safeguards of democracy was the fact that the right of unlimited debate exists in this Chamber, and I remember very well that when a distinguished Senator came to me and asked me to sign a cloture petition I talked with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. Connally], and also secured the advice of Senator McNary, of Oregon, and I did not sign it. Certainly when a Member of the Senate like Senator La Follette, who was here 11 years, or a Member of the Senate like Senator McNary, gave me such advice, I did not sign it; I took the advice of the distinguished Senator Charles McNary, of Oregon.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. LANGER. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. I wish the Senator to be correct in his statement. I am sure he did not mean to say that I asked him to sign the cloture petition, for I was against signing it.

Mr. LANGER. That is correct; the Senator from Texas was against signing it. When such a petition was brought to me and I was asked to sign it, the distinguished Senator McNary, of Oregon, joined the Senator from Texas in saying that the right of free and unlimited debate in the Senate was one of the finest things about this body.

Mr. President, again I wish to assure my friend the Senator from Illinois [Mr. Lucas], the majority leader, that if he will bring up this question of civil rights he will find no better backer than myself, and I shall be one of those who will hold up his right arm in carrying on that fight.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LANGER. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. Do I correctly understand that the Senator from North Dakota is in favor of the Wherry-Hayden resolution?

Mr. LANGER. I am not certain; that is a question we shall take up after this one. So far as the question of invoking cloture by a two-thirds vote is concerned, I am not quite sure whether I favor it or am opposed to it. I may even be opposed to it. I know that I do not favor cloture by majority vote, under any consideration.

Mr. LUCAS. In any event, the Senator from North Dakota is in favor of free and unlimited debate, and he has been in favor of it all the time, I understand.

Mr. LANGER. That is correct.

Mr. LUCAS. If the Senator does not favor the Wherry-Hayden resolution, why would he wish to keep us here for a month?

Mr. LANGER. I may be in favor of that resolution; I have not stated that I am opposed to it. I wish to study it and go over it. I do not wish to commit myself regarding it until I look it over and study it and hear the debate on it. I may even wish to offer an amendment to it.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. LANGER. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator has been talking about breaking this filibuster, but he is in favor of free and unlimited debate. I do not quite follow his reasoning, if he is in favor of having the Senate stay here for a month and if he is in favor of free and unlimited debate.

Mr. LANGER. It is very simple. If the Senator needs help, I shall be glad to give it.

Mr. LUCAS. I shall need a great deal of help.

Mr. LANGER. All the Senator from Illinois has to do is keep the Senate in continuous session. If that is done, it will not be very long, as the Senator from Michigan said today, before we shall arrive at some understanding or agreement which will be mutually satisfactory.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. LANGER. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. What the Senator says may be correct; but I am not sure that I shall be able to depend on the Senator from North Dakota, when we finally attempt to break the filibuster, to help us to break it, because he may not be in favor of the Hayden-Wherry resolution. I hope I can depend on the Senator from North Dakota when the time comes for him to go along with us.

Mr. LANGER. I assure the Senator from Illinois that I shall go along in helping secure the enactment of the Truman civil-rights program.

Mr. LUCAS. But the Senator from North Dakota makes some qualifications in that respect.

Mr. LANGER. No; I make no qualifications. When the Senator from Illinois asks me whether I favor a resolution which I have not yet had ample opportunity to study, I say that I am not sure whether I shall favor it without the crossing of a "t" or the dotting of an "i."

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LANGER. I yield.

Mr. MAYBANK. The Senator from North Dakota has mentioned the name of the great Senator Bob La Follette. I wish to ask the Senator a question, because we were here together with another great Senator from the West, Senator Wheeler. I am sure the Senator from North Dakota well remembers the debates on the floor of the Senate with that distinguished Senator from Montana. I wish to remind the Senator that many a time Senator Wheeler——

Mr. LANGER. Senator Wheeler stood first, last, and all the time for free and unlimited debate upon this floor.

Mr. MAYBANK. Also, as I remember, he was a candidate, along with the distinguished Senator Bob La Follette, of the liberal movement in America.

Mr. LANGER. That is right.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. LANGER. I yield.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I wish to inquire of the able Senator from North Dakota, in view of his statement and in view of the parliamentary situation with which the Senate is faced on the question of filibustering on a motion to take up a matter, how he anticipates he will ever get a chance to vote on any civil-rights legislation if we cannot even get it before the Senate for a vote.

Mr. LANGER. It would be delightfully simple. Just as the Senator from Michigan said today in his magnificent address, it will be possible to enact civil-rights legislation just as soon as either party makes up its mind it is going to do it—any time Republicans will make the sacrifices necessary to do it. The Senator will remember last year I brought up these Republican platform pledges. The junior Senator from Oregon rose on the floor and said he would bring up his cot every day, he would stay here a week, or a month. Just as soon as either the Republicans or the Democrats make up their minds to get the civil-rights program through it can be done. Instead of that, we adjourned for 3 days at a time until toward the end of the session. Then, in the last 2 or 3 weeks, some of us who were opposed to the drafting of our boys under selective service were kept here 2 nights, before the Republican convention at Philadelphia, all tired out. We were kept in session because Senators wanted to adjourn and go to the convention. Although many days had been wasted during the month or 2 or 3 months before that, there was an adjournment 3 days ahead of time. So I close by telling the people of this country that I am unqualifiedly for the civil-rights program and will help to enact it—if only the Democratic majority will bring it up.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I did not intend to take any of the time of the Senate upon the pending resolution, but as I sat here listening to the debate I was reminded of another debate, many years ago, upon the subject of cloture which engaged the attention of the Senate while I was a Member of the House. That debate was in 1891, and it occurred to me to send for the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I also called for the volumes covering other periods when the same subject had been before the Senate. I have before me three volumes of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD containing the reports of discussions which occurred in the Senate when attempts have been made to pass in some form a measure of cloture.

I know how prone we are, sir, in our youth, perhaps, to color somewhat the occurrences and events that then transpire. It has very often seemed to me—and I hope I will not offend against the proprieties if I say that I have had occasion to remark many times upon the public platform that it has seemed to me—that the level of statesmanship of our time in this body would scarcely measure up to that of the Senate as I knew it 30 years ago. As I listened to the debate today I trust my colleagues here will pardon me for saying that it occurred to me that the debate at this time hardly rose to the importance of the occasion. So, sir, I shall venture to trespass upon the Senate a sufficient time to put into the RECORD some quotations from the arguments made when a similar attempt at cloture heretofore was made in the Senate of the United States. This matter may not interest the Senate, but I shall read it into the RECORD in order that it may go elsewhere, to be read and considered.

The present resolution is not in the same form in which cloture resolutions were presented at other times. At one time it was proposed to make cloture depend upon the vote of the majority. I have been interested in the two views which Senators on either side take of the present resolution. By some Senators it is contended that this resolution is scarcely a cloture at all, while still others give expression to the hope that we shall very soon have cloture in its real form.

Mr. President—and until I shall have opportunity to do so in a more ample way, this is the only reference I propose to make at this time to the events of the last week—supposing the rule of cloture here proposed had been in force during the session of Congress just closed, would anybody question seriously that the exigencies of the occasion, as seen in some quarters and by at least a majority of this body, would have been sufficient to command at any time just as readily the two-thirds vote of this body as a majority vote?

Here we were in the closing days of a short session with the appropriation bills held back as perhaps rarely if ever before in the history of legislation—why, I do not pretend to say; I do not know. I do know that the Army appropriation bill, I do know that the naval appropriation bill, and some of the other appropriation bills, carried larger appropriations not only than ever before in the history of the Government, sir, but that the military and naval appropriation bills carried in themselves alone appropriations as large as were required for the entire purposes of our Federal Government only a little more than a decade ago.

Mr. President, were those bills so long in coming before the Senate because it was undesirable that they should be discussed here? In 1907 and 1908 the naval appropriations amounted to only $131 million. I remember the figures because I had taken some pains to make special investigation with respect to the naval appropriation bill of that year and participated in the debate upon it with other Senators of the same mind as myself on this floor. That was in 1908, and in the few years that have elapsed it has jumped, Mr. President, to the enormous total of $532 million. That such a bill should have been delayed somewhere until only 4 or 5 days before the close of the session; that the military appropriation bill did not come before the Senate at all for consideration and was reported from the committee—I will ask the Senator from Oregon what day he reported it?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It came to the Senate from the House, I think, on Saturday, and was reported here on the following Wednesday.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. What day of the month, and what month?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not recall the day.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Well, Mr. President, I believe it was the Wednesday before the life of the Senate expired on Sunday. Less than 4 days, sir, were left of the life of this Senate when that great bill was brought in here. The general deficiency bill and the sundry civil bill, covering appropriations for the Government service in all parts of the country, were also delayed somewhere, as these bills, with other appropriation bills, came crowding in during the last hours of the session.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Hughes in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. The Army bill was reported, according to the calendar, on the 28th day of February.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The 28th of February and we were to adjourn on the 4th of March.

Mr. President, that bill contained legislative provisions never before presented to an American Congress. Universal military training was embodied in it. With all of the other subjects involving great increases in expenditures, there was this proposition involving a complete change of policy, and the Senate must dispose of it within 5 days. There were piled up here these great appropriation bills carrying important and far-reaching changes in our law; propositions that should be thoroughly digested before action should be had; and on top of all that, about 50 hours before the Congress was to adjourn, there was brought in a bill of uncertain grant of power to another department, a bill which in the minds of the best students of constitutional government, the best authorities on international law, trenches upon the constitutional authority of Congress, and seeks to invest in another department of this Government powers denied by the Constitution. With your calendar loaded with these immense appropriation bills, carrying unheard-of propositions of legislation, you then bring in a bill of that character and demand that debate shall be made to conform to that condition of things.

With a rule such as is here proposed in force at that time, with an iron hand laid upon this body from outside, with a Congress that in 3 years has reduced itself to little more than a rubber stamp, let me ask you, Mr. President, if you do not think a rule of this sort would be bound to be pretty effective cloture? Especially is that true as some of the proposed legislation was of a character that appealed to certain Senators upon this side of the Chamber, who coming from States where the manufacture of munitions is a mighty important industry, are impressed with legislation that benefits the interests they represent?

Mr. President, believing that I stand for democracy, for the liberties of the people of this country, for the perpetuation of our free institutions, I shall stand while I am a Member of this body against any cloture that denies free and unlimited debate. Sir, the moment that the majority imposes the restriction contained in the pending rule upon this body, that moment you will have dealt a blow to liberty, you will have broken down one of the greatest weapons against wrong and oppression that the Members of this body possess. This Senate is the only place in our system where, no matter what may be the organized power behind any measure to rush its consideration and to compel its adoption, there is a chance to be heard, where there is opportunity to speak at length, and where, if need be, under the Constitution of our country and the rules as they stand today, the constitutional right is reposed in a Member of this body to halt a Congress or a session on a piece of legislation which may undermine the liberties of the people and be in violation of the Constitution which Senators have sworn to support. When you take that power away from the Members of this body, you let loose in a democracy forces that in the end will be heard elsewhere, if not here.

Now, sir, along that line, I want to put into the RECORD of the extraordinary proceeding that is to be carried out here the most thoughtful words and reflections of some of our ablest statesmen. I regret, sir, that I had not the time to examine the RECORD at greater length. The very fact that from its earlier days there has been free discussion in the Senate, and that the ablest and the most patriotic statesmanship of the country has overwhelmingly defeated the kind of a rule pending here today, seems to me should make Senators hesitate to bring in this resolution and secure its immediate consideration.

Had I been on the floor at the moment this resolution was reported—I came in a minute or two later—I would, of course, have interposed an objection to its being disposed of today. It is too vastly important. It has been considered in all time by the Senate of the United States as too vastly important to be disposed of in any summary way. Whenever it has been brought before this body heretofore it has been debated at great length and most seriously both by the Members who favored it and by the Members who opposed it.

I do not say, Mr. President, that arguments cannot be furnished for it. I do not say that the proceedings of the last hours of the recent session do not furnish such argument, and those proceedings made the occasion for bringing forward this rule at this time. At another time it could not have been done. But when there is interposed here on this floor an obstacle to the execise of a constitutional right—for a constitutional right includes your rights under the rules which the Constitution says this body shall adopt, and in resisting legislation that overturns the Constitution—it includes the exercise of all of your rights under those rules, Mr. President.

I promised myself, when I took the floor, not to discuss that, so with that statement I stop.

Mr. President, I shall read the argument made by Mr. Turpie, of Indiana, when a similar resolution was before the Senate. It covers one or two pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. After that I shall quote from Mr. Spooner, and Judge Gray, then a Member of the Senate, Mr. Teller, and perhaps two or three others, whose names I have before me. I regret that I could not have had time to read through these debates and put into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD such portions as I believe should be considered by Senators before they vote on this measure.

Let me say to the new Members who have been recently sworn in here that it may seem to you a very reasonable proposition. The Senators supporting it say, "Why, two-thirds must be in favor of it." But Senators, you will find before you have been here very long that there is an organization upon each side of this Chamber; that each organization arranges the committee assignments for its side; and that the way the committees are constructed at the beginning of the life of every Congress means the control of legislation for the entire Congress. Then, having so apportioned the Members of this body in committee arrangements, if it seems to be the will of the combined organizations, it is an easy matter to hold back the legislation in those committees until the last hours of the session. When that time comes, the desire of Senators to get away, to go to their homes, the desire to take care of the departments, to be out from under the criticism of having held up appropriation bills and starved the Government—all that, Mr. President, comes upon them with a weight that is irresistible; and one after another they break down and yield, and the program goes through, no matter what it may contain. This rule will furnish an additional incentive to hold back important legislation until the closing hours of a session, as it makes the majority certain of success in carrying through its program.

I think, sir, that I will first read a brief passage or two from the very able and extended address of former Senator Gray, now an honored member of the Federal judiciary. At one point in his discussion of the 22d of January 1891 (reading):

"Mr. GRAY. It is all a farce to talk about the reasonable limit of debate in the opinion of majorities."

This was a majority proposition. His reasoning would make it just as applicable to a majority of two-thirds.

"It is all a farce to talk about the reasonable limit of debate in the opinion of majorities, if you are to be content that free speech and liberty of debate have any place longer in American institutions.

"You say that the power of obstruction must be put down, must be taken from the minority, that it is intolerable, this opportunity and liberty of obstruction that the minority has, when the majority makes up its mind. Very well. Let us destroy the power of obstruction and you have destroyed free parliamentary government. Obstruction is the very weapon of liberty in all English-speaking countries There is no unimpeded path for a majority to walk in, no unobstructed road for its will to be worked through, unless that road and that path lead to despotism. Obstruction in parliamentary proceedings by a minority has been the fruitful source of some of the grandest achievements of human liberty that this world has known. You cannot do away with it. You cannot destroy it without at the same time doing away with the muniments of freedom and destroying liberty itself.

"We can put up with obstruction, we can pay the price of our liberties, Mr. President; we can dispense with the haste and with the so-called business methods that obtain in some parliamentary bodies, because we are willing to pay the price of liberty. If you want a smoothly working machine, if you want a governmental framework that will produce at the least expense and in the shortest time given results, then I say go to your despotism, go to a crowned czar, or go to an unrestrained majority, an unobstructed majority, and there you will get results speedily, quickly, and inexpensively, without cost of time. But you will get other results, too. The spirit of freedom will have to die and the spirit of American liberty will have to suffer a fatal lesion before that desirable state of things can be brought about."

I pass over some of this. Still quoting from former Senator Gray, from the same debate, I read the following. Let me say that he had been interrupted and reminded that the British Parliament, under the leadership of Gladstone, had adopted a cloture. His reply to that matter, which was brought to his attention by the Senator from Rhode Island, Mr. Aldrich, was as follows:

"Mr. President, Mr. Gladstone at the time he led his party in the adoption of that rule was the inveterate, uncompromising foe of home rule in Ireland. He was deaf to their appeals. He would not listen to the argument or to the speech of those who were defending its people and pleading for its women and children. But, sir, since that unhappy day Mr. Gladstone was great enough and big enough and grand enough to put behind him the errors he then committed, and to come out and place himself at the head of that gallant band of Englishmen who are fighting today for the liberty of Ireland."

Now:

"No, Mr. President, we do not need to cross the Atlantic yet for examples to follow in order that we may stifle debate on the floor of the Senate of the United States. That example does not commend itself to the good sense and to the patriotic instincts of the American people. Cloture, this foreigner, with strange air and mien, who cannot talk the English-American speech, who has not the accent of liberty on his tongue, comes here and is knocking at the door of the Senate for admission and to be taken in and made at home. It may do in France; it may do in Austria; it may do in Germany; but it will not thrive when transplanted on American soil—"

That great Democrat, Mr. President, will live to bow his head at the action forced upon the Senate of the United States by the great majority of his own party now here.

Listen to him further:

"and I predict that it will wither and die before another year has rolled around.

"What did Bentham say, that great political philosopher?

"'In France the terrible decrees of urgency for the closing of discussion may well be remembered with dread. They were formed for the subjugation of the minority and for the purpose of stifling argument which they dreaded.'

"And that is the purpose here. It is the purpose everywhere where it has ever been applied. In the countries where it obtained as an institution, censorship of the press went hand in hand with it. You cannot stifle free debate and also keep a free press. You will after a while get impatient of the strictures and the criticisms of a free, untrammeled press.

"Alien and sedition laws are of kindred blood with this rule. They did not flourish long in American soil. But they were good men who voted for these alien and sedition laws. I can see them now with their periwigged heads and their ruffled shirts and their buff vests and shadbelly coats, the very essence of respectability. They represented the conservative classes. They were good fathers, and good husbands, and good citizens, and good neighbors, and they were somewhat shocked and scandalized at the freedom of the press, and they said, as the Senator from Vermont would say or has said in substance, 'Oh, we do not oppose liberty; it is license that we oppose. We do not oppose freedom of debate; it is only unreasonable freedom of debate that we oppose.' And so they said, 'The liberty of the press is dear to us; but, my friend, you must recollect there is a difference between liberty and license.

"'License will not do.'"

He is still quoting from these gentlemen:

"'Liberty of the press—we grant that. Let us see the article. Well, that may do; it is coming very near the verge of license, though; and, if it does, then the alien and sedition law, scandalum magnatum, must apply, and the editor must abide the pains and penalties. You must recollect in conducting this sheet that you are not to cross the line. Liberty we ought to maintain. Liberty. We all love liberty. Liberty of the press is one of the watchwords of freedom. But license, oh, that is a different thing. License tends to the demoralization of the community; license tends to the sapping of the foundations of social order, and it will not do to tolerate it.'"

Resuming his argument he said:

"And so Senators will find, when you attempt to draw the distinction between freedom of debate and what is unreasonable freedom of debate, that you will run into the same shadowy ground, and you will find yourself trespassing upon the liberties that belong to all American citizens, and you will find you cannot erect any standard between liberty and license; you have got to leave it to work itself out by the good sense of the people themselves; and that has served from the beginning until now to save us from all the results that were prophesied from untrammeled liberty of the press.

"Mr. President, this measure is obnoxious to every sentiment of American freedom. Its companions are such as I have described. It must go hand in hand with alien and sedition laws and with the censorship of the press, as it has in all the countries whence the cloture, this foreigner, this exotic, has come.

"I do hope, I do believe, I express the confidence now as an American Senator, that there will be no line drawn in that alley that shall separate the friends and opponents of this measure, but that the votes will cross that line and there will be a majority—I trust not a partisan majority, but a majority of American Senators who will continue to vindicate the great principles of American liberty and parliamentary freedom as they have existed for a hundred years in the Senate of the United States."

Now, Mr. President, I read just a paragraph from former Senator Teller. He makes in his opening sentence some reference to the statehood bill, to which reference had been made in the course of the debate:

"Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I am myself very much in favor of the statehood bill and prepared to do anything which I think is just and consistent with my duty here to further that object. I agree with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Spooner], the chairman of the Committee on Rules, as to the desirability of maintaining in this body the right of free discussion. I have myself had occasion in the number of years I have served here to see the advantage of it.

"I agree with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Hoar] that the bill, which he thinks did not have any element of force in it, would have become a law if we had had a cloture rule. I, myself, was an active opponent of that bill. If it did not have the element of force in it, it had in it, in my judgment at that time, the element of fraud, and created an opportunity for dishonest people to meddle with elections. But I do not care to discuss that question. I believe that discussion created a sentiment and belief in this body—and it was very much of the character which has been expressed in the debate which is going on here this morning—that it was not wise to pass that bill. While that bill was not voted on directly, the men who voted to displace it were the men who would have voted against it if there had been a vote taken upon it.

"Mr. President, I have been a little restive sometimes, and probably once or twice I have said some things which I ought not to have said as to the length of the discussion on the statehood bill, but I myself will not vote for anything, directly or indirectly, which will indicate the right of the majority to censure the minority, or that will look directly or indirectly to any method, either legal or moral, which may prevent any Senator from exercising his judgment in securing delay whenever he thinks he ought to do so.

"I believe that there ought to be somewhere in the Government of this country a place where unrestricted and untrammeled debate may be had. I believe it was the purpose of the creation of this body that deliberation and thought and delay might be secured for great questions which might for the time being unduly agitate the public mind, either because of intense partisanship or for any other reason."

He could not have had in mind, Mr. President, the impending horror of war, but some lesser excitement where he thought it would be justifiable for any Senator to exercise his rights on this floor to delay; and when I refer to a war measure I refer to one that does not threaten invasion, not one which infringes upon rights which have not already been surrendered "and I believe that there is nothing which can so secure to the American people righteous and just legislation as the right on this floor to discuss in every way and to delay by every method which shall meet the approval of Senators acting under oath all bills or measures which they think are improper and unwise."

Mark you, the attempt to get cloture here was following a debate protracted not only days but weeks.

"I was delighted" says Senator Teller. "I was delighted to hear the chairman of the Committee on Rules say what he has said this morning. I believe he expresses the best thought of this body when he says that he is in favor of untrammeled debate and unrestricted obstruction when, in the judgment of Senators, such a course is necessary."

I now turn to read a few words from former Senator Spooner, who was at that time chairman of the Committee on Rules. In the first statement that I will read many Senators who are altogether new to this body or have been here perhaps for only a term will find reflection in their own minds of the sentiment which he expresses as to how he was impressed when he first entered this body as to this matter.

"There was a time when I was in favor of cloture—"

Says Senator Spooner—

"There was a time when I was in favor of a cloture. I have been a Member of this body now for 12 years. I have been very constant in my attendance upon its sessions; I have been somewhat active in all controverted matters which have been before the Senate. I have seen times when Members of this body, impelled not by partisanship but only by the strongest possible motives of conscience, felt constrained to resist the passage of measures which they thought were unconstitutional, or which they thought, if constitutional and passed, would be subversive of great public interests.

"I am frank to admit that years ago, when I was first a Member of the Senate and a struggle of that kind came, I was very restive under it. I thought that a minority ought not to be able to obstruct the passage of legislation.

"But, Mr. President, I do not believe there is any legislative body in this world which accomplishes as much in a deliberate, thoughtful, and careful way as the Senate accomplishes under its existing rules. The very freedom which is accorded to Senators here assures debate, which would not occur if we had a previous question. There would of necessity be an exclusion of many from debate.

"I have often seen in the newspapers and I have often heard it said that debate is of no effect in this body. That is not true. I appeal to every Senator here if the contrary is not true, as is shown at every session repeatedly upon full debate, because Senators desire here to get at the right. Sometimes we are constrained by political prejudice and more or less of partisanship where proposed legislation may have a political phase, but in the matters of legislation almost universally debate in this body has had great weight, and many Members have risen and acknowledged a change of view because of a discussion which has taken place. It would be quite absurd to have it understood that debate is of no consequence here.

"This power to stop the hasty passage of bills by a single objection in the afternoon sometimes when we take up the calendar has been of infinite benefit to the country. We rely largely upon committees. Sometimes the committees act hastily and improvidently—all the committees. Sometimes bills are reported along toward the end of the session by a poll of the members of the committee, and it has often happened that objection to a bill has delayed it for an hour until the Senator in charge could explain it; and it has often happened the delay brought about a conference which disclosed a defect in the bill which was remedied by amendment.

"It is true that when a bill is objected to by a single Senator it is possible, under the rules, to move to proceed to its consideration. I appeal to Senators that that rarely becomes necessary, and by common consent, as a rule, when a measure is objected to it goes over for examination, and that delay seldom fails to be useful "For one I have become convinced that under the rules of the Senate as they are the interest of the public, of the whole country, is better subserved than it would be had we a cloture."

Now, Mr. President, I want to invite the attention of Senators to a most remarkable argument, one which has impressed me very strongly. It contains views upon this question which, I think, should have a place in this debate; but I do not wish to take the time tonight. I know Senators are anxious to act upon this resolution, and if I can omit portions of this I will be very glad to do so. I understand that I have consent to print it all.

"Really, then, the true rule——"

Mr. OVERMAN. From whom is the Senator reading?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. From Senator Turple, of Indiana. Senator Turpie was regarded in his service, and I think he has been since by all Senators familiar with the debates, as one of the ablest constitutional lawyers who ever sat in this body.

"Really, then, the true rule is there is but one way, and has been but one way since 1806, of procuring or bringing about a vote of the Senate upon any measure, and that way is the way of unanimous consent. Theoretically one might think, if that is the case and one Member of this body may at any time prevent a vote upon any measure, legislation has not been very frequent, has been very rare, has been very uncommon in this branch; but practically it will be seen that the one Member objecting to unanimous consent, this missing unit, has been always absent. He has been conspicuous by his absence. So that votes upon the passage of bills, final votes upon the determination of any questions whatever have been as frequent here as in the other branch of the National Legislature; and taking the whole body of legislation, subjected as it has been to this rule in the Senate that a vote cannot be taken without unanimous consent, whatever other effect the rule has had it has not had the effect to diminish the amount or quantity of legislation or the sum of useful, important, and effectual legislation upon all subjects which the people demanded.

"It is very often said, sir, that the majority in this country rules—I have heard it repeated once or twice in the discussion upon the question of cloture—and, therefore, that the majority in this body should rule. That statement is much too broad, whether it be applied to the whole country or to the Senate of the United States. It is much better made in this way, and can be only truly made in this way: the will of the majority expressed under the form of law, or in the form of law, or by the form of law, or in accordance with the form of law, governs in this country and governs in this body, as will be seen in the sequel.

"The first form of law to which the majority is subject is the Constitution of the United States, and with respect to this body the second form of law is its own rules. The majority in this body controls its action when action is taken. It passes a bill or defeats a bill. But the majority in this body has never decided either when action shall be taken or whether action shall be taken at all. That has always depended upon the unit, the smallest possible minority. It is the smallest conceivable minority of this body which determines the question when action or whether action shall be taken.

"I heard this body characterized the other day as a voting body. I disclaim that epithet very distinctly. I have heard it described elsewhere as a debating body. I disclaim that with equal disfavor. This body is best determined by its principal characteristic. The universal law and genius of language have given a name to this body derived from its principal attribute. It is a deliberative body—the greatest deliberative body in the world.

"Now, voting is an incident to deliberation, and debate is an incident to deliberation; but when a body is chiefly characterized as deliberative there is much deliberation apart from discussion and debate, and wholly apart from what is called the business of voting.

"The essence and the spirit of a body like ours, now over a century old, may be best gathered from its rules of action, the body of law governing it always very small, now very brief. Of the 21 rules properly affecting parliamentary procedure in this body 11 relate to the subject of deliberation. More than one-half relate exclusively to that subject and have nothing to do with debate or voting. I suppose that the form of law under which the will of the majority must control this body embraces at least the rules which govern us. Here is rule XXII, one which touches us every day. I think it is the most frequently operative of any rule in the Senate."

Then he gives rule XXII, as follows:

"RULE XXII. PRECEDENCE OF MOTIONS

" 'When a question is pending no motion shall be received, but—

" 'To adjourn,

" 'To adjourn to a day certain, or that when the Senate adjourn, it shall be to a day certain,

" 'To take a recess,

" 'To proceed to the consideration of executive business,

" 'To lay on the table,

" 'To postpone indefinitely,

" 'To postpone to a day certain,

" 'To commit,

" 'To amend;

" 'which several motions shall have precedence as they stand arranged."

"Now, there is not a single one of these motions which relates to a vote of this assembly, to debate by it, but all relate primarily to the business of this body, which is deliberation, and they are all what are called dilatory motions relating only to deliberation. Take, for instance, the motion to adjourn. What relation has that to the merits of any bill or measure pending before this body? Take the motion to adjourn, the first in precedence, taking precedence of any question pending here, what possible relation has that to the merits of any question pending? None.

"What is the reason, then, why the motion to adjourn has attached to it this superlative excellence that it shall be first in order and shall precede all others? I have heard it very frequently said the motion to adjourn is always in order, and it is very seldom out of order. The chair is bound almost in any circumstances to entertain it. It has become almost a maxim, the motion to adjourn is always in order. It has not been always in order. The rule is only as old as the revolution of 1688. Prior to that time the house could not adjourn (I am speaking of another parliamentary body) while the speaker remained in the chair; and the speaker, a servile tool of the Crown, remained in the chair 26, 48, even at one time, as it is said, 50 hours, failing to recognize the motion to adjourn, refusing to put it, refusing to consider it, and holding the body in session simply by his presence in the chair.

"It was under such necessity that the rule now become a maxim, the statute now worn out, has become the common law of parliamentary bodies, that the motion to adjourn shall always be in order; and the reason given for it is that private conference among members is preferable to debate, and that the body must always have an opportunity at least of resorting to privy conference if it so determine.

"I might go on and notice each of these nine dilatory motions in detail to show how every one of them relates solely to deliberation, to show how this rule XXII, connected as it is with all our procedure here, daily, hourly, was characterized and will characterize this body as long as it exists as preeminently deliberative.

"All these dilatory motions resting in rule XXII have their foundation in a rule yet older than any in this compilation. It is a rule older than the Senate of the United States itself. All these dilatory motions relating to deliberation, so carefully guarded, so long observed, so characteristic of the Senate of the United States, are founded upon a rule not published in this body of rules, neither numbered nor classified. The first rule to which all our rules are subject, sir, the first rule of parliamentary procedure proper, is found in the Constitution of the United States:

" 'The yeas and nays of the Members of either House on any question shall, at the desire of one-fifth of those present, be entered on the Journal.'

"The whole series of dilatory motions and parliamentary action upon subjects here rests for foundation upon the rule I have just read from the Constitution of the United States. I speak of it as the first rule of this body. It is the first. It is older than any of the other rules. It is the first; it is a part of the paramount law of the land.

"One might think, in reading it casually, that there had certainly been a mistake by the framers of the Constitution; that, as was said of Homer, they nodded when they put such a mere surface, at first thought, provision into and made it a part of the organic law, as they might have provided in that instrument, sir, that you should rise to your feet when putting a question to the body, or that a Senator in addressing you should rise from his seat.

"Sir, this provision does not belong to that class. Why is it found in the Constitution of the United States? Senators have claimed here that a provision to cut off debate is absolutely necessary and of the highest superlative importance. Why was not that made a part of the Constitution of the United States? Senators have claimed here that a provision that a vote shall be and must be taken at some stage, at a certain stage—in other words, the closure—is imperious, is, in the language of the honorable and learned Senator from Connecticut, absolutely necessary to the transaction of what is called the business of the Senate and the business of the country.

"Why, then, was not provision made for cloture in the Constitution of the United States? The question may be asked, Why should the Constitution makers have concerned themselves at all about a parliamentary rule for the government of this body? But as they have done so, it becomes very legitimate to ask why did they not provide for the cloture and for the cessation of debate, as it is said such rules exceed in necessity and importance all other parliamentary rules.

"Let us examine this parliamentary rule in the Constitution. What was the object of it? Some man might say the object of this was to make a record. Sir, there was no necessity of such a provision to make a record. Records were made long before this provision of the Constitution. The majority had always the power to require the record to be made of a vote, and that was the former method; and the minority, a minority of one, had always the power to have his vote entered of record, either 'nay' or 'yea,' and when all the nays were put in the record the absentees and the yeas were very apparent, and vice versa. There is not the slightest use in the intendment of common parliamentary law of the world then existing to have inserted for such a reason this provision in the Constitution of the United States.

"Then it is said that the object of this provision was to assist in the passage of bills, or in other words to assist the business of enactment as distinguished from the business proper of this body, deliberation. Let us look at it in that view. It is not said that the yeas and nays of Members shall, at the desire of one-fifth of those present, be entered on any bill pending, on the passage of any bill pending; it is said 'on any question,' the most immaterial, the most irrelevant, the one most remotely connected with the business pending before this body. For instance, on the question of adjournment, the question to postpone indefinitely or to a certain day, the question to commit, the question to amend, on any of these dilatory motions one-fifth of the Members present may demand a rollcall and a record; and that rollcall and record was not, as I have shown very clearly, for the purpose of showing how a bill was passed; it relates to any question. Making a record was amply provided for. The reason of the rollcall and record is that deliberation is the province of this body. It is the office of this body. Attendance may be compelled; deliberation is compelled by this rule. Voting is not compelled, can not be compelled.

"This rule, sir, is found, as I have said before, in the organic law. It is much aggrandized, it is glorified by the company in which it is associated. This rule that one-fifth of the Members of this body may at any time demand a rollcall is placed alongside of the inhibition against bills of attainder and ex post facto laws. It is placed alongside of the affirmative power of Congress to declare war, to conclude peace, to contract alliances. It is placed alongside of that great prerogative writ of personal liberty, habeas corpus.

"It belongs to that character of legislation, except that habeas corpus may be suspended, but not even in case of invasion, not even in case of rebellion, can the great power of the potent fifth of the membership here ever be questioned, delayed, or ignored, no matter what is pending or how irrelevant it may be to what is called or may be thought the chief business of this body. The object of this rule was not to facilitate the passage of laws; it was not to make a record; it was to compel deliberation. It was to give to the minority a day in court. It may be a long day, broken, interrupted, full of excitement, in which a question is tossed from side to side as a ball between two animated bands of players. It is just in the midst of this excitement that the rule of the Constitution comes; that it says with imperious mandate, let this cease. Let the roll be called. Let your communication be yea, yea, and nay, nay. It makes a pause. It compels a pause. This rule is and always has been an element of force. It is not the cloture; it forces and compels deliberation, not enactment. It is on the side of the minority, not on that of the majority.

"Now, take this form of law, the rule in the Constitution which I have just read, in connection with rule XXII in our own body of law to which I have referred. Establish the proper connections between them, as we have often here seen done, and the operative relations, with the rule in the Constitution compelling a record, a rollcall, and with the rule in our body compelling the entertainment in their order of nine different dilatory motions, having no possible reference to merits, it will be seen that under the form of law, the highest possible form of law, deliberation is distinctly the business, province, and the office of this body.

"It will be seen how impossible under the operation even of the rule in the Constitution and how thoroughly inconceivable under the operation of our own rules it will be that debate can ever cease or that a vote can ever be taken as long as there is a dissenting unit in this hall, assisted by one-fifth of the number. It would take a reconstruction of the entire body of laws of the Senate, if not an amendment to the Federal Constitution peremptorily to enact what seems to be aimed at by the resolution of the Senator from Connecticut, and those modifications of the same now upon the table of the Senate, and yet the will of the majority rules in this body.

"Is not the Constitution of the United States the will of the majority—a will of the majority, permanent, enduring; a law for all generations? Are not the rules of the Senate of the United States, most of them a hundred years old, the will of the majority, the permanent will? The will of the majority, it rules here in the same manner as elsewhere; the wish of the majority of the hour or of the day, the wish in regard to a pending measure, in regard to a pending bill, in regard to a pending enactment, in regard to any parliamentary action here, does not control. It is itself controlled and governed by the will of the majority, the law of the land and of the Senate.

"The nine dilatory motions now compellable to be entertained by the Chair, the questions in relation to excuse, the questions in relation to appeal, without exhausting even a very small minority in this Chamber would in a parliamentary manner, in a distinctly constitutional manner, occupy the whole of the remainder of the present session of Congress. We must rely upon the assent of the fifth.

"I am aware, sir, that such action as I have alluded to, action confined entirely to what are known as dilatory motions, is called obstruction, but I am not prepared, and I never heard any Senator here who expressed himself ready, to define the difference between obstruction and deliberation. One thing is very certain, the Constitution of the United States makes no distinction between obstruction and deliberation. It provides in express terms for deliberation in the very method which we of the hour might call obstruction.

"It is the fortune, sir, of free parliamentary government to be subject to the sleepless vigil of dissent, of resistance, and of that sort of resistance which may end in revolution. The shadows of agitation and of revolution are constantly following the feet of those who are engaged in free parliamentary discussion and legislation. Behind obstruction at a greater or less distance is always agitation, and at some distance and at some time may be always revolution.

"We have been frequently entertained here with a description of the hardships, and I do not wish to disparage them, of continuous session, of night sittings. They are very feeble antetypes, they are very frail mimic representations of the campfire and bivouac, but they do foreshadow them. I very much doubt, and I have thought a great deal about it and read something on the subject also, whether the establishment of cloture in this body would tend to increase the chances of public order, of public security, of wholesome agitation, and of legitimate resistance.

"My impression is that the establishment of a cloture in this body would have the contrary tendency. I think that it would not diminish the real power of the minority. Cloture is after all suppression, repression here, to be harvested afterward in boundless expansion elsewhere; and the statesman repressed, the Member of this body suppressed, subjected to force and duress, returns for that very reason no longer of the minority, but with the majority behind him. A vote by force is not a vote either as to the time when it is taken or as to the character of the subject to which it relates or as to the place where it is cast. A vote by compulsion is not a free act; and yet the first definition of a vote is volition, the expression of the will, absolutely free, of the voter.

"After all, as I have had occasion to remark upon subjects somewhat cognate, the very highest official functions in a free government are not compulsory and cannot be made so. It is made the duty of the Vice President to recognize a Member who rises in this body and addresses him. Suppose he fails to do that; suppose he neglects to do that; suppose he wrongfully, knowingly, defiantly, refuses to recognize a Senator who addresses him, how shall we compel recognition? I am speaking of the action of the highest functionary. I know very well if the Secretary disobeys our orders, or if the Sergeant at Arms disobeys the rules governing him, the remedy is very swift, very complete, perfect; but with respect to the highest function and duty there is no remedial operation and can be none.

"Of course, it is possible that the officer might be punished; but that would not restore recognition. It is the duty of a Senator rising here to effect the Chair. It is the duty of a Senator under one of our rules to vote when his name is called. Suppose he does not vote and offers no excuse, how can we compel voting? That is a high function of a Member of this body, perhaps one of the highest; and the other, I think, is the very highest function belonging to the Chair, the function of recognition. It is the initiative in the great lesson of parliamentary liberty. Both these functions must depend—they do depend, Senators—upon the sanction of honor alone, stainless honor. They have no other sanction.

"There is no obligation upon a Senator or upon the Vice President in respect to these high functions, except the sense of duty and the love of country. Heretofore these great sanctions have been sufficient. They have sufficed for all hours, for all days, for all perils, all dangers; but if they ever prove to be insufficient, how shall the sublime duties and motives, such as love of country and the obligation of conscience and honor, be supplied by the adoption of a parliamentary rule?"

Formerly the edge of revolution came very near to obstruction. This was a parliamentary program of a body older than our own. Appropriation, revenue, and relief were put into the same budget and constituted a part of the same bill. For instance, such a proposition as the repeal of the Sherman Act, or any other conceivable relief, was not attached as an amendment to the budget, because that would have raised the question of cloture and of all other manner of deliberation, but it was placed originally in the same bill and reported with supplies, with appropriations.

Then, when the majority of the body defeated an appropriation and refused to grant supplies, defeating therewith relief, they attempted to take supplies by force, without the warrant of law, and that attempt to take supplies was resisted. The ayes and noes became bills and bows; obstruction blossomed into civil war. It was no uncommon thing, and happened three, four, or five times during the reign of the Stuarts and the sovereigns who preceded them.

I cite these examples for the purpose of showing, not that obstruction is illegitimate, but that it is an extreme remedy. Cloture itself belongs to the same class. I do not think that the rejection or establishment of cloture would determine much with respect to the right or power of a minority here or elsewhere; but I have been always of the opinion that constitutional deliberation, or, if you please to call it so, obstruction, is nearer the line of parliamentary freedom, of liberty of debate, than the other rule which is sought to be adopted, or at least is now being considered.

I am not taking the position that the cloture is unconstitutional, but it is in very sharp contrast—not in conflict, but in very sharp contrast—with the only parliamentary rule proper laid down in that instrument. There might be an extremity of emergency which might justify it, but I see none now, and in the calmest times I should much hesitate even to consider it.

We must continue to appeal to the wisdom and moderation and the well-known devotion to duty of our fellow Senators. I may submit whether there be enough of magnitude in the present question to justify a resort to the constitutional method of delay and that length of deliberation ordinarily called obstruction.

Whether we vote or do not vote, the ultimatum is appeal to the country. We must go to the country; we must go to our constituencies in either event; an appeal to the country is stronger, is more direct, on the basis of a vote, than that of abstention from voting. Responsibility for obstruction is infinitely greater than that of voting.

Mr. President, I shall be the last, here or elsewhere, to announce myself as being in favor of the legislation which was pending in the last hours of the preceding session, or to renounce my right under the rules and the Constitution to discharge my duty to the country as I see it. The argument made by Mr. Turpie against the cloture rule at that time applies to the situation that confronts the Senate now. I believed this resolution if presented today would not be immediately pressed for consideration, so I have had no opportunity to prepare and present to the Senate such views as I have upon this question. I could not, however, permit this vote to be taken without putting into the RECORD and reading to the Senate the views of such men as Judge Gray, the late Senators Teller and Turpie, and my one-time associate in this body, Senator Spooner.

I realize how the hysteria of the moment may be driving Senators to acquiesce here in a procedure which at another time they would resist with all their force. But so far as I am concerned I will never by my voice or vote consent to a rule which will put an end to freedom of debate in the Senate. The adoption of this rule marks a decline in the influence of the Senate in the Government. I know that the majority are determined. I believe that a majority of that majority are in this matter yielding their judgments, and that the time will come when the men who are now clamoring for this change and who by their votes are imposing cloture upon the Senate will see that rule invoked to deprive them and their States of what they deem their rights. I cannot prevent the adoption of this rule, so I am content at this time to protest and vote against it.

EXCERPTS FROM CONGRESSIONAL RECORD ON UNLIMITED DEBATE

Mr. Harris (Tennessee) January 22, 1891 (p. 1670): "So, I assert with absolute confidence that from the 26th day of March 1806, there has been no proposition to limit general debate in the Senate that has not been rebuked as an attack upon free speech and upon the rights of the States and the people and dangerous to well-considered legislation as well as to civil liberty. They have been, as they ought to have been, invariably defeated. * * *

"Legislation in a Government like ours should reflect none other than 'the mature, deliberate, and well-considered will of the people, their sober second thought.'

"Absolute freedom of debate, with the right of unlimited amendment, may be and doubtless is sometimes abused, but there are none of the privileges enjoyed by humanity that are not subject to abuse.

"As legislators we can better afford to submit to any amount of abuse of the right of free speech and amendment than to the passage of measures without full, mature, and deliberate consideration.

"The greatest evil that can possibly result from the abuse of the right of unlimited debate and amendment is the postponement of a measure to another Congress; but if such measure is demanded by public interest and a matured public sentiment, the people may be confidently relied upon to send men to Congress who will enact it into law.

"It is better, much better, that we make hast slowly than to dispose of great questions promptly, but without the fullest, most mature, and deliberate consideration.

"While one house of the legislative department is so fettered by its rules as to prevent full debate and amendment to great and important measures, is it wise or safe to the country to gag the other House so as to render it impossible to freely and fully debate and suggest amendments to important legislative propositions on the other."

Mr. Cockrell (Missouri) January 22, 1891 (p. 1688): "I now read what Mr. Benton, of Missouri, on July 15, 1841, said: 'With respect to debates, Senators have a constitutional right to speak; and while they speak to the subject before the House there is no power anywhere to stop them. It is a constitutional right. * * *'

"I now quote from the other Senator from Missouri at that time, Mr. Linn: Mr. Linn said it was an old Scottish proverb that threatened people live longest. He hoped that liberties of the Senate would yet outlive the threats of the Senator from Kentucky. But, if the lash was to be applied, he would rather it was applied at once than to be always threatened with it. There is great complaint of delay; but who was causing the delay now growing out of the threat? Had it not been made, there would be no necessity for repelling it. He knew of no disposition on the part of his friends to consume the time that ought to be given to the public business. He had never known his friends, while in the majority, to complain of discussion. He knew very well and could make allowances that the Senator from Kentucky was placed in a very trying situation. If he brought forward measures that were questionable he had to encounter resistance. But he was in the predicament that he had pledged himself to carry those measures, and if he did not, it would be his political ruin. He had everything on the issue, hence his impatience to pronounce judgment against the right of the minority to discuss those measures. * * *"

Mr. Gorman (Maryland) January 22, 1891 (p. 1691): "* * * But, Mr. President, the length of debate, the time to be consumed upon a proposition, is determined by the circumstances and the importance of the measure. The proposition now pending, coming, as it does, under the peculiar circumstance and in the peculiar way in which it has been brought before this body, makes it necessary that we should proceed with caution and proper deliberation. We are taking a step which, in my judgment, overturns the whole history of this body. The measure itself comes before the body under most peculiar circumstances. It has been brought here by the decision of the Chair and the vote of the majority of this body in direct opposition to every rule of parliamentary law, both specific as provided by the rules of the body, and general parliamentary law, and no instance in the history of legislation can be cited where such action has been taken as was taken during this day's session; that is during the calendar day of yesterday, but of today's session, as we only had a recess from 6 o'clock last evening until 11 o'clock this morning.

"Good government and orderly conduct of the business of 62 million people, in my judgment, are involved in this proposition. Freedom of speech and all that follows in its wake are to be determined by the resolution now pending. In my judgment, Mr. President—and I speak alone for myself—I think it is the most revolutionary proposition which has been presented. I think if it is enacted and we should be bound by it, its consequences cannot be measured by any man, not to the South, but to the North, and to the West, and to the entire country. It jeopardizes all business interests in my judgment, and the good conduct of our local governments in all of the States of the Union. Mr. President, such a proposition, if I have properly characterized it, ought to have at least fair debate before we are brought to a vote upon it."

Mr. Cockrell (Missouri) January 22, 1891 (p. 1692): "Mr. Dickinson said: 'I have great distrust as to the propriety of invading any old parliamentary custom which has been practiced so long. There may be instances when it is desirable, for the sake of promoting the public interest, to get rid of debate; but those instances, I think, are very rare indeed in their occurrence. In my judgment, so far from restricting or condemning full debate, we ought, as a general rule, rather to encourage it. Freedom of discussion is the great safety valve of our institutions and doubtless saves us from the commission of many an error.

" 'Many questions are brought before us here which when first introduced we do not understand, and in order that we may understand them we are led into research; and thus the mind of this body not only becomes enlightened, but that of the public also. Anxious as I sometimes am to see matters acted upon speedily, I am still unwilling to see the whole parliamentary practice of the world overturned for the purpose of obtaining the end proposed. I shall therefore vote against this proposition in any form. * * *'

"Mr. President, I have detained the Senate longer than I anticipated or desired. I wanted to discuss this infamous cloture rule, a proposition to gag Senators, to cut off amendments, to stop debate, to rush measures through the Senate without due consideration, without any effort at proper amendment. I should like to have said more upon the force bill, and I had hoped while that bill was up that an opportunity would be offered me to speak upon the inequities of many of its provisions, the uselessness of many of its provisions, the extraordinary expense that will be imposed upon the American people by that measure, which will be anywhere from fifteen to thirty million dollars."

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, my amendment, which I have had placed on the desks of Senators, has for its purpose the establishment of a rule of germaneness or relevancy both for amendments and debate after, but only after, the motion to proceed to the consideration of the amendment has been adopted. The provision would be comparable to unanimous-consent agreements which are frequently entered into, except that under my amendment no time limit is involved. Debate on an amendment could continue as long as desired, provided it were germane. The intention is to improve the efficiency of the legislative process and to save time for everyone, as well as to produce more orderly procedure without in any way curtailing the right of any Senator to speak as long as he desires on the subject at hand.

When a unanimous-consent request is made, as it is frequently made after debate has run on for some time, it is generally coupled with a request to limit the time allotted to any amendment. It is also generally coupled with a request that amendments be germane and that debate be germane.

My proposal for a rule change deals wholly with the latter part, that is, the germaneness of amendments and the germaneness of debate.

In his remarks earlier this afternoon the able Senator from New Jersey [Mr. CASE] referred to the fact that in the early practice of the Senate, debate was required to be relevant. In his remarks a few days ago—I believe it was on last Thursday—the Senator from New Jersey said:

> The fact is that so-called unlimited debate in the Senate is a myth. History shows clearly that up to the time of the Civil War a majority of the Senate, under its rules and precedents, and under the dignity of its customs, did have the authority to, and for the most part effectively did, limit debate and prevent filibusters. The Senate did it by insisting that Senators confine their remarks and speeches to the question at issue, and that they conduct themselves in a manner in keeping with the traditional courtesy and dignity of a Senator. There may be exceptions, but the truly representative picture of the Senate before the Civil War, as shown by our historical records, is that the body observed dignity and restraint in debate, and did not consider talking to consume time a parliamentary instrument appropriate for the Senate. When delays by speech were tolerated, the Senators engaged in such dilatory tactics either kept their talks germane or the majority did not choose to insist on the strict observance of the rules and precedents.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota will suspend. The Chair will ask Senators who are conversing to retire to the cloakrooms or elsewhere, so that the speaker may be heard.

The Senator from South Dakota may proceed.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. In Jefferson's Manual, which was the early guide for the Senate, in the very early years, Jefferson stated:

> No one is to speak impertinently or beside the question, superfluously, or tediously.

Jefferson cites three authorities, "Scob., Hats., and Hale."

Various Members of the Senate have spoken to me about the amendment. The distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK] has asked that his name be added as a cosponsor of the amendment, and I was happy to include his name. The distinguished Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BUSH] has spoken to me about the amendment. I shall be glad to yield to him at this time.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield time to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I yield, but I reserve my right to the floor.

Mr. BUSH. I certainly support the amendment. I congratulate the Senator from South Dakota for bringing it before the Senate. I think it is a very constructive amendment. One of the weapons of the filibuster is to consume time on completely irrelevant and nongermane subjects; indeed, to harangue the Senate at times with reading from books and other writings. It is really an offensive practice. It is certainly out of keeping with the high traditions of this body in debate.

I believe those who sincerely favor the stopping of filibusters and of preventing issues from coming to a vote in the Senate should seize upon the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota and support it for that very reason. It is designed to bring to a vote the pending question by taking away the weapon of delay. It still leaves with the Senate, of course, the power of cloture under the rules of the Senate.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. The amendment does not relate to cloture.

Mr. BUSH. No, it does not relate to cloture; it still leaves the cloture provision intact; but simply serves to bring debate to a close by eliminating all nonessential subjects.

Many Senators have often been present when the Senate was reaching the closing arguments on a particular measure. Suddenly recognition is accorded a Senator who may rise and talk for 3 or 4 hours on an entirely unrelated subject, thus delaying the action which might have taken place that very afternoon. The floor then becomes empty, Senators return to their offices, and the whole situation is delayed for as much as 24 hours, simply because one Senator, when a matter was approaching a decision, decided it was time for him to make a speech on foreign affairs or some other subject.

Under the Case amendment, the Senate will have a chance, after a week of debate on any particular issue, to invoke the provision of germaneness.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. The Senator from Connecticut used the phrase "after a week." The Senator spoke to me about that. I should be glad to modify my amendment in that direction, if the Senator so suggests. But as the amendment is pending at present, it does not include that phrase.

Mr. BUSH. I understood, as the clerk read the amendment, that the Senator had modified his amendment. As the amendment was read at the desk, it incorporated the modification which the Senator from South Dakota had discussed with me. I am very glad that he so modified his amendment.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Someone, I think, was talking with me at the time the amendment was read. I assumed it was read in its original form. But I should like to state publicly that the suggestion to strike out "at any time" and to change the amendment so that it will read "during the consideration of a bill, resolution, or other matter pending before the Senate for one week or more" is agreeable to me. The change to provide for a week's free-running debate was made at the suggestion of the able Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BUSH. I thank the Senator from South Dakota for that generous acknowledgement. I thank him, in conclusion, for yielding to me. I express my wholehearted support of his amendment in its present form. I hope the Senate will adopt it.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I appreciate the support given by the Senator from Connecticut.

Since we are speaking of a modification of the amendment, I should like to make a minor modification: in line 6, to strike "a motion" and insert in lieu thereof "motions"—in the plural; and also in line 7 to make the word "motion" in the plural—"motions" so that it will be possible, if a motion were once made and not agreed to, to have it made later on in the course of debate. The modification will simply be to change "motion" to "motions"—in the plural.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised that the modifications proposed by the Senator from South Dakota have been made.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I thank the Chair.

I now yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, if the Senator from South Dakota will permit, I should like to have my name added as a cosponsor of the amendment offered by him.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I appreciate the opportunity to have the name of the senior Senator from Ohio added as a cosponsor of the amendment.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I should like to adopt as my own the remarks made by the Senator from South Dakota and the Senator from Connecticut regarding the reasons why this amendment should be adopted. When we speak of a debate, we speak of a discussion which is intended to enlighten Senators upon issues in controversy. Debate does not mean discussion which is not germane to the issue and does not at all aid Senators in reaching a sound judgment on the questions before them.

With these few words, I have given an indication why I believe germaneness of argument is necessary. Nothing is more painful than to live in the interior of the country and to find in the newspapers descriptions of Senators reading almanacs and other documents which have no relationship to the issue, and which are purported to be read under the guise of free speech and legitimate debate.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I think the able Senator from Ohio has pointed out a way in which the standing of the Senate before the country would be enhanced if we had a rule of germaneness applying to debate. I point out also that by adopting the suggestion offered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BUSH] the debate would run for a week, at least, without any attempt to apply the rule of germaneness, at least unless it was done by unanimous consent. But after debate had run for a week on a bill or other measure before the Senate, it would be the privilege of any Senator to raise the question of germaneness. If the motion were accepted, then it still would be possible, if a Senator wanted to talk about something else, to ask for unanimous consent that he might do so, the same as he does now when unanimous consent agreements are entered limiting the time of debate and limiting the matters which are germane.

If a Senator wishes to present an important subject to the country, he today, under unanimous-consent agreement, may ask for time to speak on a subject which is not germane, or he may do so in the morning hour. But I think all Senators have experienced much frustration at times, when we have been busy in a committee meeting or busy in our offices, and have been advised that a quorum call is in progress, that the Senate is about to vote on such and such an amendment, and we are asked to come to the Senate Chamber as quickly as possible, to find when the quorum call has been completed, that some other Senator will take the floor and speak on a subject utterly foreign to the question at hand.

Such a practice takes the time of Senators and the time of important officials of the Government, who may be testifying before a committee which has permission to meet while the Senate is in session. It is disruptive of orderly procedure.

I honestly believe the adoption of the amendment and its presence in the rule book would make it possible to save hours of time for each individual Senator and many hours of time for other Government officials.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I yield.

Mr. BUSH. I do not know whether the Senator pointed this out earlier in his remarks, but if he did not, I should like to say that the question of germaneness is nothing new in the Senate. I hardly ever assent to a unanimous-consent agreement which does not contain a provision for germaneness. The Senate has many times approved the idea of germaneness when it has wanted to settle a question. The advantage of the Senator's amendment is that after a week, the Senate will have a chance to adopt a motion requiring germaneness, not by unanimous consent, but by majority vote, thus confining, by a majority vote, the argument and the debate from that time forth to the subject which is before the Senate.

Certainly, Senators who favor bringing the Senate to a decision in due course on any question should be willing to favor the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. COTTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I yield.

Mr. COTTON. The Senator's amendment provides:

> If such a motion shall be determined in the affirmative, any amendment thereafter proposed, together with debate thereon, and all debate under the order for pending business, shall be required to be germane to the subject matter before the Senate.

Is it correct to interpret the Senator's amendment to mean that up until the time the rule of germaneness is invoked, any pending amendments which have been offered, or even those which are lying at the desk to be offered, would still be eligible for consideration, even though they were not germane? Is my understanding correct?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. It is correct.

Mr. COTTON. I should like to make certain that there is nothing in the Senator's amendment which would hamstring the Senate or any Member thereof, when the time comes, as it frequently does, because of the rule about certain subjects—such as amendments to tax bills which must originate in the House, or for some other reason, when the only way whereby certain legislation is available to Senators is by amendment on some other subject. The Senator's amendment would not, would it, in any way preclude or make difficult or limit the freedom of the Senate to deal with those subjects under those circumstances?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. That is certainly correct. I am glad to have the Senate emphasize that the word "thereafter" is included. It is any amendment thereafter proposed, after the affirmative acceptance of the motion. Certainly, with the many bills which come before us and the leeway of a week, if a Senator felt he should offer to a pending bill an amendment which was not germane, he would have plenty of opportunity to do so. That would not change the situation.

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, I am interested in the word "proposed" in that connection. Instead of the word "offered," in connection with the amendment which we are now considering, and which has been submitted by the distinguished Senator from South Dakota, it is entitled at its very inception with the words "intended to be proposed by Mr. CASE of South Dakota." That would seem to indicate that it is not proposed until it is called up. The language would seem to indicate that any amendment thereafter proposed is included, and we may get into trouble with the word "proposed."

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Yes. I modify my amendment by using the word "offered" instead of "proposed."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will make the modification of the amendment.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, I did not understand the modification.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. On line 2, page 2, change the word "proposed" to "offered," so that the language would read, "any amendment thereafter offered," to get away from the technical interpretation that an amendment might be proposed without actually being offered.

Mr. COTTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I yield.

Mr. COTTON. This colloquy disturbs me. If the amendment means anything, and is clearcut, and brings about the result the Senator desires, and is not a rather loose and ineffective amendment, I still have the apprehension that somewhere along the line between the definition of "offered" and "intended to be offered," the adoption of the amendment to the rules of the Senate will result in depriving Senators and the Senate of one exceedingly valuable privilege—exceedingly valuable for the welfare of this country—of getting onto this floor some necessary proposed legislation which occasionally—we are talking about freedom of the Senate—it may be bottled up in a committee, or, when, because of conditions governing this body and the other body of the Congress, we can get to it only by amendment which is clearly not germane to the pending legislation.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. The Senate would be in no different position than it is today when a unanimous consent agreement is entered into and amendments are limited to those which are germane.

Mr. President, how much time have I consumed?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLAND in the chair). The Senator has consumed 27 minutes.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate is proceeding under a unanimous consent agreement. If the Senator calls for the quorum in his own time, that is permissible.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I withdraw the suggestion for the moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator withdraws his suggestion.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, I should like to have 5 minutes on my own time, if the Senator is prepared to yield the floor.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I yield the floor, and reserve the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The acting majority leader, the Senator from Oklahoma, is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, I am in complete sympathy with the objectives and, in general, the proposals of my able and distinguished colleague, the Senator from South Dakota. I, myself, have prepared a resolution in the same direction, and had it ready to offer for consideration, had we needed a compromise amendment as between those who advocated majority cloture and those who advocated 60 percent or 66⅔ percent cloture.

I said in my speech to the Senate, which was to have taken 2 hours, but I used only about 20 minutes, that I had such great respect for the traditional and historic rulemaking customs of the Senate that I would much prefer, although I strongly advocate a majority rule of germaneness on pending business, to submit the question to the Committee on Rules and Administration. I do not believe that it is ever wise, excepting in cases of extreme urgency, to use shotgun methods to amend Senate rules. They are fundamental to our very procedures.

While the proposal of the distinguished Senator from South Dakota, which parallels mine in most degrees, is completely in the right direction, I, as one of the advocates, over the years, of reorganization of Congress and other efforts, have long felt the need for a majority motion to provide for germaneness in debate and amendments. However, I have learned in the reorganization of Congress that many times, when we are ready to enact certain bills, and we hear the testimony of experts, of Senators, of political scientists, and other authorities, the methods of application of the rules, and the entire Senate, are better served, and the functioning of the Senate is better served, if we do not try to change the basic cornerstones of the existence of this body in a few moments of open debate on the floor of the Senate.

I am in accord with the purposes of the amendment, but I call attention—and the errors of my resolution were called to my attention—to the fact that there are questions to be raised. I provided the same language in my resolution as is carried in the last paragraph of the amendment of the distinguished Senator from South Dakota, namely:

> All questions of relevancy under this rule, when raised, including appeals, shall be decided without debate.

With respect to most of the provisions in the rule he seeks to amend, namely, rule XIX, when a Senator is proceeding out of order, the offending words are taken down and are reported to the Senate. I can visualize many occasions, when a point of order might be made that a Senator was not proceeding germanely to the pending business, that there might be only a handful of Senators present to know what he was talking about and to know whether the remarks were germane or nongermane. I think some provision should be made at least to have the Official Reporters read the portion of debate against which the point is made that it is not germane. That was a fault of my resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Before the Congress convened the Senator from Oklahoma talked to me on the telephone about the study he had made in this field. He later came to my office and brought with him a great amount of material which he had assembled, and a draft of a resolution. The Senator from South Dakota discussed this matter with me before he offered the amendment. I have reviewed the proposal with the distinguished minority leader in some detail.

If we could act on Senate Resolution 5 today I would hope that some time this week we could have our committees organized and ready to start functioning.

I have agreed with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CASE], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. MONRONEY], and the minority leader [Mr. DIRKSEN], if this procedure will be agreeable to them, that the leadership on both sides of the aisle will ask the Committee on Rules and Administration, the distinguished chairman, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS], and the ranking minority member, to give prompt hearings on the whole subject of germaneness, at which time the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CASE] and the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. MONRONEY] could testify, and the committee could get information from any other Senators desiring to give it, as well as any other experts who would be available.

I would hope that procedure would be acceptable. I would hope that the suggestion could be followed. I believe it would expedite action on the resolution. I believe it would result in a thorough study of this subject, and I believe it would result in prompt action by the Committee on Rules and Administration.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I well recall the days in the House of Representatives when the distinguished Senator from South Dakota brought an enduring interest and great skill and great resourcefulness to the question of a study of the rules. I think I can testify to that from long experience. His interest was retained when he came to the Senate, and I was delighted to hear him so many times when we had a discussion about the rules.

I always thought he had become a truly great scholar in the parliamentary field.

I concur in the sentiments expressed by the majority leader that often, in circumstances of this kind, situations arise which cannot be foreseen. When an attempt was made to get a unanimous-consent agreement on the pending resolution the other day it was necessary to make an exception with respect to the Case proposal, which is presently before the Senate. Sometimes questions develop, and the whole subject deserves a real study by the Committee on Rules and Administration. I concur in that sentiment, insofar as I have any authority in the matter. I would be more than happy to see the Committee on Rules and Administration give it a thorough and sustained hearing, and I think probably something could be done in this field, for the reason that much can be said in favor of germaneness in the field of enacting legislation.

If it were not for the rule on germaneness in the House of Representatives, it would become almost impossible for that unwieldy body to function in the field of legislation. That is the long and short of it.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota and Mr. BUSH addressed the Chair.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, do I still have the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma has the floor.

Mr. MONRONEY. I shall yield to my distinguished colleague from South Dakota, the author of the amendment, if the distinguished minority leader has finished.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield himself an additional 10 minutes?

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield myself an additional 5 minutes, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, I must say that the distinguished majority leader and the distinguished minority leader are always persuasive. However, in this instance I was a little bit chilled when the distinguished minority leader referred to sustained consideration in the Committee on Rules and Administration. [Laughter.]

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I remember the other day when the distinguished majority leader was speaking he said, in effect, "You can always change the rules if you can get the votes and can get the question to a vote." I have been around Congress long enough to learn that sometimes it is as difficult to get a matter to a vote as it is to get a bill to the Senate floor. It is precisely because I would like to see the Senate get to a vote that the amendment was proposed.

I should like to say a word or so with respect to my asking the other day that it be in order to consider the amendment notwithstanding the fact that it was not germane to the resolution. I recognized that the amendment was not germane under the rule, when the Senate has a resolution before it which proposed to amend two particular specified sections of the rules. The germaneness amendment was drawn by the Parliamentarian for me, and he thought it should have been applied to rule XIX. The pending resolution, Senate Resolution 5, proposes to amend rules XXII and XXXII, so obviously I recognized it might not be germane to consider the proposed amendment. The very fact that, recognizing that, I asked to have it made in order, illustrates the value of having a rule of germaneness, so that we can keep amendments on the track.

From a parliamentary standpoint, if I wanted to, I think I could force a vote on the proposed amendment. I think that is my right and privilege. However, I have also been around the Senate long enough to know that one gets further if he works with the leadership, particularly if he has the leadership on both sides on his side. I do not mean by that statement to infer that the leadership has made any commitment as to supporting necessarily what might come out of the Committee on Rules and Administration, but, if the matter should go to the Committee on Rules and Administration with the request of the majority leader and the request of the minority leader that it be given active and careful consideration and reported expeditiously, I know that the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. MONRONEY], who certainly has spent a great deal of time on organization and procedure of legislative bodies, and I might go before the Committee on Rules and Administration and be assured of a constructive and careful hearing. On that basis I would be willing to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I thank my colleague of the House and of the Senate for his very kind remarks.

I now yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I am sorry I am a victim of my own semantics, being so feeble in my selection of words. I could give my friend from South Dakota some comfort. I was interested in an amendment to the rule to prevent dual sponsoring of bills. We were able to get the bill reported by the Committee on Rules and Administration and to have the bill placed on the calendar. I hope a similar proposal at this session will get to the calendar, and I hope it will have action by the Senate.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Could the proposed amendment be referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration for consideration?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised by the Parliamentarian that it could not be. A resolution in the same words or of the same substance could be submitted at the convenience of the Senator and referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. If it is not out of order, then, Mr. President, I should like to ask that I may submit the language of the amendment as it has been modified as a resolution to be referred appropriately to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I asked the Senator to yield so that I might have my name added to the resolution as a cosponsor.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I would be happy to have the Senator from Connecticut or any other Senator who might so wish become a cosponsor.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I concur in what the Senator from South Dakota has said. I would not want to be committed to the language of any resolution, but I feel committed to urge the Committee on Rules and Administration to give expeditious action to a hearing on a resolution on this subject and to attempt to come to some decision as to the wisdom of reporting it to the Senate. The Senator may be assured of my good faith in that connection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota has asked unanimous consent that the pending amendment, as modified, may be at this stage submitted by him as a resolution for reference to the proper committee. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Dakota? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The amendment is now withdrawn.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, are there further amendments at the desk?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised that there are no further amendments at the desk.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. A resolution, of course, does not require a third reading, but I desire to yield time on the resolution. I therefore ask unanimous consent that no further amendments be in order, so that we may proceed to yield time on the resolution to any Senator who cares to make statements about it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader has asked unanimous consent of the Senate that no further amendments shall be in order or be offered to the pending resolution. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas?

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, do I correctly understand there are no further amendments at the desk?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is so advised. The Parliamentarian advises that there is another printed amendment, but there has been no indication given it will be offered.

Mr. MORTON. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair, of course, has no independent information on this matter. Does any Senator have any further amendment which he wishes to offer? If not, is there objection to the proposed unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, reserving the right to object—and I shall not object—do I correctly understand there will be an opportunity to speak on the resolution itself?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. A resolution is not subject to a third reading, as is a bill. I have been trying to proceed as I have suggested. Is there objection, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous consent request of the majority leader? The Chair hears none, and unanimous consent is given.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. How much time remains unallocated on the resolution?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised by the Parliamentarian that 117 minutes remain for the proponents of the resolution, and 88 minutes remain unused by the opponents of the resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, if Senators who desire to speak on the resolution will communicate with me I shall be glad to yield to them. First I shall yield to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL].

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. How much time does the Senator desire?

Mr. ROBERTSON. Ten minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I yield first 7 or 8 minutes to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President. I do not know that I shall take all the time allotted. I realize opposing the resolution at this hour is not likely to be very effective.

In the course of this debate, Mr. President, some questions have been raised which I desire to discuss briefly for the benefit of the RECORD. I refer to the statement made first on January 4, 1957, by the Vice President of the United States, and which has been repeated again and again on the floor, that section 2 of rule XXII is unconstitutional.

Mr. President, to me that is the most fantastic assertion that I can possibly imagine. The Constitution of the United States expressly provides that each House may determine the rules of its proceedings. Under this provision, any rule which the Senate sees fit to adopt is constitutional until and unless it is changed by the Senate itself. I do not see how anyone can possibly dispute that conclusion.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, it is not possible to hear the speaker. I ask for order in the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ENGLE in the chair). The Senator will suspend until the Senate is in order. The Senate will be in order.

The Senator from Georgia may proceed.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, if the fantastic conclusion to which I have referred is correct, the Senate of the United States has been acting in an unconstitutional manner for 170 years, because for 170 years this body has met, acted on legislation, changed its rules, and adjourned without there being any provision in the rules making it possible to apply cloture to a motion to take up a resolution to change the rules of the Senate.

Why, Mr. President, we voted expressly upon this issue as late as March 11, 1949, when the rule was last changed. The then Presiding Officer, the able former Vice President of the United States, the late Alben Barkley, ruled that rule XXII did apply to a motion to take up a change in the rules. That contention was challenged, and by a vote of 46 to 41, the Senate overrode the decision and declared that under the Constitution the rules of the Senate permitted free and unlimited debate upon a motion to change the rules as well as to any other proposed legislation coming before the Senate.

Out of that vote came the new rule XXII, which specifically permitted the application of cloture to motions to proceed to the consideration of bills. As I look back down the lane of years, I am sure that the great men who adorned this body in years gone by would be startled and surprised to hear it said today that they acted in an unconstitutional manner, and that the rules under which they proceeded were unconstitutional.

Any limitation whatever on debate in the Senate is of comparatively recent origin. The assertion has been made time and again that in the early days of the Republic the Senate had a "previous question" rule. The Senate for a few years did have a "previous question" rule; but it was the rule of the old English House of Commons which did not shut off debate but merely laid aside temporarily the matter pending before the body if the motion were approved.

I was interested a year or two ago when the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] placed in the RECORD extracts from the old Congressional Globe, as the original RECORD was called, which showed the use of the "previous question" motion. He said that this showed that the "previous question" was used to cut off debate in the Senate. I had an opportunity to look over the material a few days later. There was no proposal to change the rules then, but I became quite busily involved in what was called the civil rights legislation of 1957, so I did not undertake to correct the error at that time. But the RECORD which the Senator from Illinois offered to support his contention showed that the man who moved the "previous question" followed his motion with a speech in behalf of the motion. The RECORD showed that the Senator who moved the previous question urged the Senate in a speech to adopt his motion. That RECORD shows on its face that the motion for the "previous question" was clearly debatable and that it did not shut off debate. I do not have all the RECORDS before me today, but I have studied the RECORDS of the Senate—and have read the debates of years gone by.

One of the clearest statements on the use of the "previous question" was made by a distinguished Senator from Kentucky, Senator Carlisle, who, I believe, served as Speaker of the House of Representatives prior to the time he came to the Senate. He obviously had given a great deal of study to this question. He made a lengthy speech in the Senate, citing exactly what was proved by the RECORD quoted by the Senator from Illinois; namely, that the motion for the "previous question" was merely a parliamentary device to get rid of a pending matter without voting on it on that particular day. Senator Carlisle showed conclusively that the "previous question" was in nowise related to a gag rule to deny Senators the right of free speech.

I am saddened by the thought that the Senate of the United States should now be prepared to adopt what is known as the Johnson resolution, sponsored by the distinguished majority leader and co-authored by 40 other Senators. There is no need on earth to further curtail the right of free speech in the Senate.

We hear much talk about filibusters, yet no one has pointed out to this body a single highly desirable, advantageous bill that has been defeated by unlimited debate in the Senate.

We can read the statements of the great men of other years—Senator Reed, Senator La Follette, Senator Norris, Vice President Adlai Stevenson, grandfather of the former Governor of Illinois and twice a Democratic standard bearer, and many others. These giants of the past believed that the widest latitude and freedom of debate in the Senate was the greatest bulwark of liberty in the United States.

A great deal of political pressure has been generated over this issue. Great labor organizations and other powerful groups, such as the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, are demanding that the rules be changed. There is a demand for further tightening and further squeezing to choke off debate, thus destroying the prerogatives and power of individual Senators, and cutting down still further the rights of the States of the Union.

It is a sad day when the Senate demeans itself by imposing still further limitations on the powers and rights of those who represent great States of the Union in this body.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON] such time as he may desire.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, I wish fully to endorse and associate myself with the very clear and emphatic statement recently made by the distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], indicating why he and I see no necessity to change the time-honored rule of the Senate and place a limitation upon debate on a motion to change the rules. In view of the fact that I have voted against all amendments to Senate Resolution 5, I desire at this time to summarize briefly the views I expressed last Friday as to why I see no necessity to change rule XXII.

The United States of America became a political unit only through agreement of thirteen independent States on a compromise plan. An essential feature of that plan was a Senate in which the largest and smallest States would be equally represented and in which minority rights would be fully protected. The purpose of rules for free debate were adopted for the protection of those minority rights.

The relation of the U.S. Senate and its rules of procedure to the controversy over ratification of the Federal Constitution may not be obvious but a review of the debates in the State ratifying conventions or the published arguments of the Federalists and the anti-Federalists of that period will clearly shot it.

Without attempting an extensive review at this time, let me illustrate by one specific reference to the Virginia convention, which played a decisive role.

Addressing the Virginia convention Patrick Henry, who had been recognized as the sparkplug of the Revolution said in his criticism of the proposed constitution:

> Here is a revolution as radical as that which separated us from Great Britain. It is as radical, if in this transition our rights and privileges are endangered, and the sovereignty of the States be relinquished; and cannot we plainly see that this is actually the case? The rights of conscience, trial by jury, liberty of the press, all your immunities and franchises, all pretensions to human rights and privileges are rendered insecure, if not lost, by this change. * * * You are not to inquire how your trade may be increased, nor how you are to become a great and powerful people, but how your liberties can be secured; for liberty ought to be the direct end of your government.

Ratification occurred because the convention chose to accept the assurances of Washington and Madison and others who said, as I shall point out presently, that the rights of the States had been recognized by the framers of the Constitution but, to remove any possible doubt as to their intentions, a series of amendments could be adopted by the next Congress putting in written form the implied rights of States and individuals and the limitations on the central government.

These reassurances included the endorsement of George Washington, who threw his great influence on the side of the Constitution and said the choice was between "adoption or anarchy." They included also the support of John Marshall, who said later in one of his opinions:

> No political dreamer was ever wild enough to think of breaking down the lines which separate the States, and compounding the American people into one common mass.

Even in the light of these positive assurances of recognition of and respect for sovereign rights of the States, however, Massachusetts ratified the Constitution only under promise of amendments, Virginia with a demand for them and New York practically upon the conditions of amendments.

The first 10 amendments adopted, included, as I need hardly remind Senators, the ninth, which says:

> The enumeration in the Constitution, of certain rights, shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.

And the 10th, which says:

> The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

There can be no question, therefore, as to the intention of the Founding Fathers to protect States rights but since, as Patrick Henry said, the central government was given the power of the sword and the purse, how could the preservation of those rights be insured?

The Chief Executive of the Nation is sworn to uphold the Constitution, but if he interprets his duties as permitting interference in fields reserved for State action, who shall check him? The courts, and especially the Supreme Court, are interpreters of the law, but when the highest court conceives of itself as a policymaking body and issues orders involving social reforms which interfere with State functions, how can this trend be checked? The Congress, in addition to having the power to make laws, has the power to impeach the President and other officials, but what if the popularly elected representatives yield to public clamor and endorse proposals which infringe on States rights?

It is when an answer to these questions is sought that the unique position of the Senate in our system of government becomes apparent. This body is the one place where the sovereign States are represented as such and on a basis of equality. Even though Senators, since the adoption of the 17th amendment, are elected by the people instead of being chosen by State legislatures, they still are representatives of their States as a whole and are insulated from temporary waves of popular sentiment by 6-year terms and by having no more than a third of the Senate seats at issue in any one election year.

That traditional function of the Senate can be exercised effectively only so long as this body remains a truly open forum in which each spokesman for a sovereign State can expound his views for as long as his conscience dictates when the rights of his State or the integrity of the Constitution which protects those rights are threatened.

Therefore, I say that before we tamper with a plan of proceeding which has been carried on with such distinguished approval for a century and a half, we should be very certain that there is justification for a change.

That brings me to my second main point, which is that a change in the existing rules is unnecessary.

The record shows that many bills against which extended debate was directed ultimately were passed and I believe careful study would reveal that in most instances the legislation was improved by the cooling off period.

In the entire history of the Senate only 11 bills have been completely blocked by filibusters. These include the Force bill of 1890, which would have provided for Federal supervision of elections; the armed-ship resolution of 1917 which turned out not to be needed after we declared war on Germany and nine so-called civil-rights bills all of which were unconstitutional in whole or in part.

Four poll-tax bills would have interfered with the constitutionally granted right of the States to handle elections and invaded a field that can be legitimately reached only through a constitutional amendment. Three antilynching bills obviously infringed on the police powers of the States, entering the area which Hamilton said would be so troublesome he could not conceive of Federal officials attempting it. Two fair employment practices bills also would have dealt with private justice between citizens of the same State, an area in which Hamilton said the transcendant advantage belongs to the State governments.

Defeat of these few bills is the net cost of past filibusters. And what is the threat of future losses which makes a rules change at this time seem so urgent to some of its advocates? All they can mention are some more so-called civil-rights bills which, under the guise of protecting specific rights claimed by certain minority pressure groups, actually threaten the broader rights of all the people to which Patrick Henry referred as the precious jewel—public liberty.

These bills are not wanted by the great mass of the people of the country. If there were a genuine national demand for them, instead of merely a synthetic pressure to promote them, they could be passed under existing rules.

Debate can be ended now by a vote of two-thirds of the Members of the Senate. If a national emergency, such as that which Woodrow Wilson thought existed in 1917, should demand prompt action on some legislation, I am confident that more than two-thirds of the Members of this body would cooperate in silencing obstructionists. The necessary votes also would be obtainable to stop a filibuster even in peacetime against obstruction of any truly vital legislation.

Our present rule on limitation of debate is adequate and changing it is unnecessary.

My final point is that a radical change in the present rule would be dangerous to what some day may be a minority view on the subject of private enterprise and detrimental in the long run even to the interests which now advocate the change.

Newspaper writers and other commentators are inclined to describe those now advocating a change in our rules as liberals who have been frustrated in efforts to promote civil rights bills or social welfare measures and to associate defense of free debate with an ultraconservative viewpoint. The RECORD shows, however, that free debate, including efforts which have been generally recognized as filibusters often have been used and defended by liberal leaders.

A delay, during which the people of the country are made aware of the details of an issue, can be used, and has been used to help bring about reforms, as well as to block passage of oppressive measures.

There was, for example, the extended debate in 1863 against efforts to suspend the writ of habeas corpus. There was the filibuster against an Army appropriation bill in 1876 which carried a rider that would have suspended existing election laws. There was the successful filibuster in 1890 against the Force bill, which would have provided for Federal supervision of elections.

Our distinguished former colleague, Senator George of Georgia, testified during the 1947 hearings on proposals to limit Senate debate that if there had been such a limitation in 1937 it would have been impossible to rally enough support to block the effort of a powerful and popular President to pack the Supreme Court, and Members now in this body will recall that in 1946 the House passed in a matter of minutes a bill to draft striking railroad workers. That proposal, so violently objected to by organized labor, would have become law but for the opportunity of the Senate to analyze it in a deliberate manner.

In the 1957 Senate committee hearings a spokesman for the AFL–CIO said that powerful organization favored a change in rules to limit Senate debate primarily because of the apparent need for more comprehensive Federal legislation in the field of civil rights. In 1925, however, when Vice President Dawes was trying to get the Senate to adopt a previous question rule he was denounced by the American Federation of Labor for trying to gag the Senate and threaten the rights of the people and in 1946, as I have indicated, absence of such a gag rule may have been all that prevented striking railroad workers from being drafted into military service.

It matters not, Mr. President, whether the minority at any particular time represents a basically liberal or a basically conservative viewpoint—the group which does not have a majority of votes needs some protection against unreasonable impositions and the U.S. Senate was designed to provide that protection.

I stress the interest which liberals should take in the preservation of free Senate debate because those who claim to speak as liberal leaders have become the immediate advocates of a change. But the interests of those who call themselves conservatives, in the sense that they would preserve our great national heritage, also are deeply involved.

I was pleased to see recognition of this fact during the 1957 Senate committee hearings when the National Society of the Sons of the American Revolution put in the record a resolution of unalterable opposition to any change which would substantially alter the right of free discussion secured by Senate rule XXII. This resolution said:

> Freedom of debate in the U.S. Senate performs the same essential function as freedom of the press under the first amendment, in keeping the people fully informed in respect to matters which may vitally affect their freedom and the security of constitutional rights.

I was pleased also that my fellow Virginian, Dan Daniel, as National Commander of the American Legion, authorized the Honorable John J. Wicker, Jr., to put him on record in those hearings as opposing any further limitation of Senate debate.

The love of liberty is not dead in our nation, nor is there a lack of voices willing to speak in defense of those institutions on which our freedom was founded. But, to preserve a forum for those voices, we must respect the advice of Thomas Jefferson, who said in his Manual of Parliamentary Procedure on which our Senate rules are based:

> As it is always in the power of the majority, by their numbers, to stop any improper measures proposed on the part of their opponents, the only weapons by which the minority can defend themselves against similar attempts from those in power are the forms and rules of proceeding which have been adopted as they were found necessary, from time to time, and are become the law of the House, by a strict adherence to which the weaker party can only be protected from those irregularities and abuses which these forms were intended to check and which the wantonness of power is but too often apt to suggest to large and successful majorities.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I yield 10 minutes to my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL].

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, the Senate's first debate of the Session has brought to light a fundamental issue between the rights of minorities and the functions of majorities.

The various proposals which have been offered to amend rule XXII seek to reach a determination—if you will—a balancing, between these two fundamental concerns of the Senate. I strongly urge that the resolution, Senate Resolution 5, to amend the standing rules of the Senate as offered by the Senator from Texas with whom I have joined be promptly adopted.

This resolution will provide a method for limiting debate much more effective than the present cloture rule; and in my judgment a method for concluding debate which will best achieve a sound balance between the rights of minorities and the functions of majorities.

My record in support of changing rule XXII speaks for itself. I first appeared before the Rules Committee in 1946, urging that rule XXII be liberalized. In 1947 and again in 1949, I filed resolutions concerning the cloture rule. I was particularly concerned with applying cloture to a motion to take up a pending bill. The rule was changed to accomplish that purpose in 1949. Before that time rule XXII was virtually useless because debate could not be terminated on a motion to take up a bill and filibusters were directed to such motions.

It is important to emphasize the objectives we seek. On the one hand, we have an objective to assure the ability of a majority of the Senate to perform its legislative duty with respect to thoroughly considered propositions. On the other hand, our objective is to insure adequate protection for the interest of any minority from impetuous, ill-considered, or oppressive action by a majority.

Our task is to strike a proper balance between these two objectives. The Senate's mechanism for striking this balance is the cloture rule. In my opinion, the balance is now weighted too heavily against the ability of the majority to act. Furthermore, and of even greater significance, the balance is frozen by section 3 of the present rule XXII, which prevents cloture on changing the rules of the Senate.

I support the resolution which is before us for two reasons:

First, it would unfreeze the balancing mechanism by permitting cloture on a motion to change the rules of the Senate, including the cloture rule itself.

Second, it would establish a better balance between the objectives of protection of minority interest and assurance of majority action than does the present cloture rule. It would permit the application of cloture on the vote of two-thirds of those Senators present and voting instead of two-thirds of all Senators, as provided by the present rule.

A cloture rule of two-thirds of those present and voting is analogous to the constitutional provisions followed by the Senate in the case of ratifying treaties, adoption of constitutional amendments, impeachment, expulsion of Members, and overriding vetoes.

The amendment proposed would require that Members in opposition be present and vote to be counted. A Member now can in effect be recorded in the negative simply by being absent as the rule requires two-thirds of all the Senate to vote affirmatively. This is one of the chief weaknesses of the present rule or of any proposal for a constitutional majority. This proposed rule in Senate Resolution 5 would assure that only votes actually cast by Senators present would be counted in determining cloture.

Protection of minorities is a fundamental bulwark of our democratic system. The very concept of equal representation among the States was adopted by our Founding Fathers when the Senate was constituted. They recognized the need for the protection of minorities.

We must remember that, depending on the issues, today's minorities may find themselves with tomorrow's majorities; and parts of today's majorities may be the minorities of tomorrow.

It is essential that we consider the rights of all minorities within the context of the total range of issues which time will bring to our calendar and to the calendars of future Senates and not simply on one issue of paramount present concern to a particular minority.

In my opinion, the proposed rule change in Senate Resolution 5 will strike a sound balance, on all issues between protection of the rights of minorities and the ability of majorities of the Senate to act.

I strongly urge that the Senate proceed to prompt adoption of Senate Resolution 5.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, every Member of the Senate is the custodian and defender of the reputation and assets and values reposed in this institution by the Founding Fathers.

My own feeling is that we have paid much too little attention in this debate to what I believe is the principal point involved, and that is the necessity of recalling that the Senate is and was designed to be the stable institution and stable member of the legislative body, and the stable guardian of our country.

No one, because of a present objective and current impulse, should forget for a moment that precious value which every Senator should do his utmost to uphold.

Mr. President, I shall not discuss at length the details of the resolution. I do wish to say, however, that I have been particularly alarmed by those who styled themselves as highly liberal Members of the Senate, and who are so impressed with the importance of the immediate objective which they regard as of very great importance to the country that they tend to forget their responsibility to maintain the stability of the Senate. I recognize their great sincerity. However, as I see it, of the greatest importance is maintaining the stability of this institution. That means not only today, and not only in safeguarding a minority in which they are interested, but it means in every respect, particularly from the standpoint of safeguarding the interests of every minority, whether it be a racial minority or regional minority, such as those of us who happen to come from the South represent.

I am always impressed by what has been told us by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], the wisest man in the Senate, that his State would not exist as a State except for the rules under which unlimited debate is permitted in the Senate, because it enabled dedicated Senators to force back the desire of many to make one State out of Arizona and New Mexico, and that through the efforts of these Senators, who believed that there was a future involved in those two areas, made it possible for two States ultimately to be admitted under two new resplendent stars in our flag.

I believe that everyone recognizes the wisdom of that stand and many others which have been taken under the rule of unlimited debate.

I regret that our most liberal friends should be so zealous in their pursuit of an immediate objective, in which they are most sincere and concerned, that they should overlook the fact that time after time in the past—and there will be more occasions in the future—when there have been questions of divisions between majorities, sometimes great majorities, and minorities which were small at times—and when minorities had much in support of their views—they found that they had to rely on the rule permitting unlimited debate.

For just a moment I should like to quote for the RECORD some statements which show that the Senate was designed to be the stable segment of our Government. I should like to read from two papers of James Madison in the Federalist. Perhaps some will say, "You are living in the past." Yes; I want to get all the facts out of the past, and profit by them, and then I want us to live in the present and in the future.

The Senate, in 170 years, has attained dignity through holding onto the stability which it was intended to possess, so that it might well serve the people. Nine times in two letters written by James Madison, letters 42 and 43 in the Federalist, we find the words "stability," "stable," or "instability," depending on the context. Always, he emphasizes the fact that stability is the quality which the Founding Fathers were seeking to maintain in the founding of the Senate, and in that connection he has used also the words "the necessity." I may have to read a few words out of context, but these words are not taken out of context: He speaks of the "necessity of some stable institution in the Government."

Then he goes on to say:

> Every nation, consequently, whose affairs betray a want of wisdom and stability, may calculate on every loss which can be sustained from the more systematic policy of its wiser neighbors.

Then the effect of instability is developed at length. Then he continues:

> In another point of view, great injury results from an unstable government. The want of confidence in the public counsels damps every useful undertaking, the success and profit of which may depend on a continuance of existing arrangements.

Then he refers to the fact that no government will long be respected "without possessing a certain portion of order and stability."

Madison comes to the second letter. His first paragraph includes these words:

> Without a select and stable member of the Government the esteem of foreign powers will not only be forfeited by unenlightened and variable policy, proceeding from causes already mentioned; but the national councils will not possess that sensibility to the opinion of the world, which is perhaps not less necessary in order to merit, than it is to obtain its respect and confidence.

Then he uses the phrase "Stable body has been necessary," when he speaks of the necessity to bring back to one of the States mentioned, the stability which it had lost through undemocratic and unstable processes.

Then again he says:

> The proper remedy for this defect must be an additional body in the legislative department, which having sufficient permanency to provide for such objects as require a continued attention, and a train of measures, may be justly and effectually answerable for the attainment of those objects.

Then again he speaks of the "necessity of some institution that will blend stability with liberty."

In one of his last references to this particular quality of the Senate, he says that "liberty may be endangered by the abuses of liberty, as well as by the abuses of power; that there are numerous instances of the former as well as of the latter; and that the former, rather than the latter, is apparently most to be apprehended by the United States."

Mr. President, we have sustained that point of view and that objective through 170 years of the history of the Senate.

I have been particularly impressed by the unwillingness of new Members of the Senate, or a great many of them, to take a stand in support of a proposal which would wipe out the experience of those years, and the stability which the Founding Fathers have sought to attain, and which has been attained by the Senate.

I have noticed with a great deal of interest the able paper written by one of the new Senators—and I was surprised by his vote—the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCCARTHY], which statement is now a part of the RECORD, and in which he said, in so many words, that one reason the Senate has become the dominant body is its continuing nature, as compared with the temporary nature of the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield me 4 additional minutes?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I will take the chance of some Senator not taking the full 4 minutes already allotted to him. I have 117 minutes remaining, and I have allotted all of them already. I yield 3 additional minutes to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, the fact is that if this stability were yielded, we could become too responsive to pressures. We are all familiar with the fact that there are group pressures upon us already—but I also include pressures from the executive branch of the Government. I have reference particularly to a powerful and very popular President coming into office with the Congress controlled by his party. I can think of instances in the past when great damage could have been done to our Government if there had not been an acceptance and a perpetuation of the idea of the continued existence of the Senate.

Mr. President, as to my own position in this matter, I am extremely unwilling to weaken the cloture rule, even in the slight degree involved here, but I believe that by assuring a declaration by a large majority of the Senate that, in our opinion, the Senate is a continuing body, and that these rules must be applied to any effort that is made to change the rules, such great stabilizing value will come from said declaration that I intend to support the pending resolution.

Mr. President I yield the floor.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Pennsylvania. Then I shall yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I shall support Senate Resolution 5 on the final vote, but my reasons for doing so are not the same as those stated by the Senator from Florida. Ours, I may say to my good friend from Florida, is not a temporary objective. Our objective is to protect the majority from the tyranny of a minority. We will return to that fight again.

I shall support the resolution, first, because I believe the first section of it does make some minor improvement in the present cloture rule; second, because the second section, in my judgment, improves the present cloture procedure by permitting cloture to be invoked when the question to be considered is to change the rules. That I think is a minor but definite improvement. In my judgment, section 3 of the resolution is unconstitutional, null, and void, and nothing we say nor do can make it otherwise. I am, therefore, not concerned about section 3.

I shall support the adoption of the resolution for the reasons I have just stated.

I thank the Senator from Texas for yielding me the 2 minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina as much time as he may desire.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, last week in opposing the motion presented by the Senator from New Mexico, which the Senate tabled by a vote of 60 to 36, I stated that I was against any change in rule XXII which would tend to further limit debate in the Senate.

While the so-called Lyndon Johnson resolution on rule XXII would not be as dangerous or go as far in this direction as the Anderson proposal, nor as far as some other proposals placed before the Senate on the subject, I am still against it. I shall fight anything which comes before this body that would make it easier to cut off debate by any Member in this body.

Senate resolution 5 by our majority leader would only give proponents, of cutting off debate on a subject, the advantage of absentee Senators, but this is a radical enough change for me to oppose it. Worse, it is an opening wedge which will invite others to come back year after year to continue to assault our time-honored and time-proven rules of procedure. Enough compromises such as this over the years and one will not be able to recognize the Senate.

The tyranny of the majority could deprive a State of the right to be heard on any subject. There is all to lose and nothing to gain by making a so-called compromise on our rules. I do not believe in compromising liberty, and that is what we are doing when we compromise on unlimited debate in the Senate.

As I have pointed out several times, the Senate of the United States is a continuing body. Its rules have heretofore been considered as continuing. The Founding Fathers established the Senate as a continuing arm of the legislative branch of our Government. A brief reference to paragraph 2 of section 3 of article I of the Constitution proves this point. It provides as follows:

> 2. Immediately after they shall be assembled in consequence of the first election, they shall be divided as equally as may be into three classes. The seats of the Senators of the first class shall be vacated at the expiration of the second year, of the second class at the expiration of the fourth year, and of the third class at the expiration of the sixth year, so that one-third may be chosen every second year; and if vacancies happen by resignation, or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.

Paragraph 1 of this section established the term of office of a Senator to be 6 years.

In the first election, all Senators were elected for 6 years, but upon reaching the Senate, they drew lots in order to determine the length of their first term so that the 6-year term of one-third of those elected was reduced to 4 years and a further third was reduced to a term of 2 years. Thus a body of two-thirds of Senators in number existed beyond each biennial election for Members of the House of Representatives. Each State by the Constitution was guaranteed, however small in population, no less than two Senators. What was the purpose of the Founding Fathers in these provisions? They were establishing safeguards to protect the rights of minorities. Were these safeguards not established in our basic law, some historians doubt that the Republic could have been founded. Our Founding Fathers were ever conscious of the rights of minority groups and by these provisions sought to secure them for all time to come—not only for themselves, but for posterity.

Not frequently, but ever so often, we have experienced a desire and effort on the part of some of our Members to change these fundamental concepts. They want a change in order to more quickly pass some pet measure or to accomplish some unmeritorious purpose. I fear they disregard the protection which our rules give them and that, if successful, they will rue the day they changed the Senate's procedures for a temporary advantage. There are some in the Senate today who are vigorously supporting a change in our rules, though only last session they were using the provisions of our rules to engage in extended and unlimited debate against some pending measure they opposed.

It has been my privilege to serve as a Senator from the sovereign State of South Carolina now for 14 years. I am a South Carolina Senator in the U.S. Senate, as each of you represent a State. During this service I have never known a deserving piece of legislation to fail because of any obstruction caused by our present rules. I have known of proposed legislation to fail by reason of the extended debate permitted by the rules, and I have recognized that such failure was for the best interests of our Government and people. Rule XXII is a safety valve against hasty, ill-advised action. It has never succeeded in killing deserving legislation.

We see in some parts of the daily press and in some magazines derogatory and critical articles concerning our rules and procedures under which we have so successfully and so long operated to the great advantage of our country. Filibuster is the term used by them. It is employed by them to denote a practice they oppose. The word "filibuster" has gathered a lot of bad odor in relation to its real meaning.

But all publications have not looked upon our rules with disfavor, as in the case of The Saturday Evening Post which I quoted earlier. In 1949, when attempts were being made to destroy unlimited debate under rule XXII, I brought to the attention of the Senate in my debate then an editorial which was published in the March 12, 1949, issue of Business Week.

I feel it is imperative again at this time to bring this article to the attention of the Senate:

THE TYRANNY OF THE MAJORITY

Filibustering has become a horrid word in the American language. It has been described in the mildest terms of its critics as a technical evil connected with the machinery of lawmaking.

It has been cursed and condemned as a device against democratic decision.

The sharpest criticism has been leveled at filibusters in recent times by those who carry the liberal label. They are good and mad at the southern Democrats. They lambast the southerners in the Senate for filibustering against all attempts to put civil rights legislation on the Federal statute books.

Unconsciously, the zeal of the so-called liberals has befogged their minds. Unwittingly, they are sniping at democracy and liberty. They assert that what they are seeking is a further expression of democracy, and that they are going after it in the democratic way. But they obviously are not remembering their American history.

LESSONS OF HISTORY

A refresher course would remind them right at the beginning that this Nation's Government was framed to avoid tyranny in any form. The drafters of the Constitution put in safeguards against despotic power in any hands.

The Founding Fathers went to great pains to set up a system of checks and balances. They apportioned power among the legislative, executive, and judicial branches of the Government. They determined to place checks on the powers of all—even the powers of the people who had the right to vote. Thomas Jefferson, for example, was convinced that government by a simple majority could be as despotic as the one-man tyranny of the British king.

This aversion to simple majority rule explains the makeup of the Senate. The upper House of Congress was designed deliberately as an offset to the popularly elected House of Representatives. Each State has an equal number of Senators, regardless of population. The Senators are elected for a term three times as long as the Representatives, and only one-third of the Senate comes up for election every 2 years. Obviously, the Senate was never intended to perform its functions and reach its decisions by snap judgments of temporary majorities. It is supposed to function only after the careful deliberation permitted by unlimited debate.

Through the years when slavery was the big national issue, there were great debates. The North sought to impose its will on the minority of States. The South clamored for States rights. After a war was fought to preserve the Union, President Lincoln was moved to say:

"There is too much desire on the part of some of our very good friends to be masters, to interfere with and dictate to those (southern) States, to treat the people not as fellow citizens; there is too little respect for their rights."

The fundamental belief in the democratic rights of a substantial minority has never been successfully submerged. It has been the salvation, in turn, of both conservatives and liberals. The latter certainly can recall the power of the individual expressions of such liberals as the two La Follettes—expressions which took the form of filibusters more than once. In a speech against cloture, the elder Senator La Follette said:

"Believing that I stand for democracy, for the liberties of the people of this country, for the perpetuation of our free institutions, I shall stand while I am a Member of this body against any cloture that denies free and unlimited debate. Sir, the moment that the majority imposes the restriction contained in the pending rule, that moment you will have dealt a blow to liberty. * * *"

Full and free debate in the Senate is more than a precious heritage. It is more than an effort to protect the right of free discussion. It is an expression of the doctrine that no one group should be in a position where it could beat down all opponents mercilessly. The doctrine states that important minorities should be persuaded and must not be coerced. No one group should be able to impose its own opinions, its interests, its views on others if, by so doing, the vital interests of other groups are not at all respected. This is the practical core of American government in operation.

LONGSTANDING TRADITION

The principle, of course, is not written down in black and white as a government law. It is simply a tradition. There is serious doubt whether it could ever be made official. But it is workable nevertheless.

Any infringement of the right of unlimited debate in the Senate would lead to coercion of important minorities. Stifled debate would give to the majority free and careless sway over legislation. This would defeat the basic American idea that all absolute power must be limited—including the power of the majority of the moment.

As long as there are conflicts between the majorities and the minorities, there will be dilatory debate of some sort. And delay is not easy to accept. But an intelligent majority will be wise to accept some measure of delay if it is really convinced that its objective is basically sound.

Filibustering admittedly is a negative device. But so is a brake on an automobile. The brake can check the speed of the car if it gets out of control. Filibustering is useful when it checks the impulses of an unscrupulous or an inconsiderate majority. In the present situation, filibustering is not directed solely against the passage of civil rights legislation. The filibuster is being employed to curb the headlong enactment of an ill-advised administration program fraught with great peril to a free society.

Actually, our rule providing for free and unlimited debate is a protective shield. It has never really damaged our country, but to the contrary has saved it from damaging legislation on more than one occasion.

During my short lifetime, the country has successfully fought four wars—the War With Spain, World Wars I and II, and the Korean war. We have passed through two major depressions and several minor recessions. We have successfully come through all these and scores of other emergencies without any harmful effects to the country by reason of the present or past requirements of our rules, and especially rules providing unlimited debate. Why, then, is there this clamor for change? Is there any real substance to the argument for a change? Does any present emergency exist requiring a change? What, then, is the necessity for a change? The clamor comes from within the ranks of our Members, not from the country. The substance of any argument for a change becomes unreal when analyzed. No emergency is at hand that I can see. Consequently, there is no necessity for any change so far reaching and the consequences of which are so uncertain.

The Senate is our last citadel of freedom and unlimited debate. Shall we undermine its historic bases and whittle away its strength? We are told that the House of Representatives organizes itself each session, adopts new rules, and proceeds in normal fashion to transact its legislative business. That is true, and the Constitution commands such action. The Senate is unlike the House of Representatives in composition, in its terms of office, and in its rules. Different provisions of our Constitution establish the House of Representatives and provide for its actions. Since the Constitution by its very terms provides that the Senate shall be a continuing body, and since the Constitution is the contract entered into with the people of our States, I shall defend this principle and I shall not be one of those willing to breach that contract.

One of the most sensible comments on perpetuation of rule XXII was made only last year by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. CURTIS] when he stated his individual views in Senate Report No. 1509 on proposed changes in rule XXII. He stated then:

A number of scholarly statements have been written setting forth the historical background of the rule in the U.S. Senate allowing unlimited debate. Rather than attempt to add to such statements, I wish, briefly, to state my own views which have been arrived at by observing the Senate for 20 years.

1. I believe that the right of unlimited debate is a force for the preservation of individual liberty, the maintenance of a Government of law, and the adherence to the Constitution and the rights of our sovereign States. It places the rights of a minority, regardless of how small, and the rights of the individual in proper focus.

2. I believe that unlimited debate in the Senate tends to slow down and prevent the passage of legislation, thereby retarding the growth of big government and lessening the burdens of Government on our people.

3. I believe that in some place in our large and complex Government there should be unlimited discussion of public issues and that the Senate by reason of its size and its tradition and history is the logical place for unlimited debate.

4. I believe that the present cloture rule is an adequate restraint upon the right of unlimited debate in any time of emergency.

For the foregoing reasons I am opposed to Senate Resolution 17.

In the same report the Senator from Georgia [Mr. TALMADGE] made an outstanding presentation in his individual views. Among other things, he stated—and I concur with him:

It must be recognized that the Senate of the United States, as an instrumentality of the States and their citizens, is the property of every American and does not belong to the individuals who transiently occupy the seats in its Chamber. Individual Senators have no proprietary rights in the operation of the Senate except as they act as creatures of the will of the States and constituents they represent.

Ample means are available at present to overcome what a majority at any time may feel to be needless obstruction in debate. The use of protracted sessions and strict enforcement of all Senate rules afford adequate safeguards to bring to an end even the most determined and prolonged debate. Whenever any issue of overriding importance to the welfare of the Nation arises, it goes without saying that debate will be limited accordingly.

Standing rule XXII permits limitation of debate by two-thirds of the Senate membership (64 Senators) 2 days after a petition has been submitted by 16 Senators. Thereafter debate is limited to 1 hour for each Senator. Cloture cannot be applied to a proposal to change the rules.

The tradition of the Senate, its prestige, and the permanence of our constitutional prerogatives and legislative functions are at stake in this debate. I trust I shall never be guilty of voting for a temporary advantage, or for a purely political or strictly partisan motive. Here in the Senate, where the debate of public questions is unlimited, the sunlight of truth can be focused on all legislative proposals.

The Senate is permitted to inform itself. The Senate is permitted under the existing rules to inform the people, who will be regulated by what we do. We are permitted the time in which to be enriched by the views of our constituents on public questions as a result of our debates. The advantages to our constituents and to us will be lost if our rules permit an abrupt end to our deliberations and our discussions. No longer will the Senate merit the approbation that it is the greatest deliberative body on earth. It will become a debating society hemmed in with restrictive and prohibitive rules to curtail its discussions. It will become a forum for quick action. It will enable a majority to practice, if it will, tyranny upon a minority. It will be a terrible blow to freedom in this country. It will be saying to the world we do not believe in full and unlimited debate.

The protection of minority rights about which our forebears were so concerned, and about which we are all today concerned, will become nothing more than a memory. Let us preserve freedom of debate. Let us protect the rights of every minority now and in every succeeding session of the Congress. If in the past we had suffered some catastrophe by reason of our existing rules and their provisions for freedom of discussion, then there might be some justification for an amendment. I know of no such calamity. I can conceive of none happening in the future.

Concern over changing rule XXII is felt among large organizations and a vast segment of our people. Concern is not confined to Members of the Senate.

The Society of the Sons of the American Revolution meeting in 1957 at Salt Lake City adopted the following resolution on the subject:

Whereas maintenance of freedom of debate in the U.S. Senate performs the same essential function as freedom of the press, under the first amendment, in keeping the people fully informed in respect to matters which may vitally affect their freedom and the security of constitutional rights.

In recent years various attempts have been made to bring about the enactment of restricted rules in the Senate of the United States which may endanger freedom of discussion in that House of Congress.

We recognize the possibility of abuse of the right of free debate in the Senate, just as we know that freedom of the press is, at times, abused.

The alternative, which is control of debate, and may lead to a condition equivalent to censorship, is too dangerous to be seriously considered: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That we express our unalterable opposition to the enactment of any rule in the Senate which will substantially alter the right to freedom of discussion secured by Senate rule XXII.

We call upon the Rules Committee of the Senate to protect this essential right when acting on pending proposals relating to the change of that Senate rule.

Foregoing resolution adopted by 67th annual congress, National Society of the Sons of the American Revolution, meeting in Salt Lake City, Utah, May 29, 1957.

The American Legion likewise opposes changes in rule XXII, as outlined in testimony presented to the Senate in 1957 in a statement by John J. Wicker, Jr., representing the then national commander of the American Legion, before a special subcommittee of the Committee on Rules and Administration. One of Mr. Wicker's comments stands out. I should like to quote it at this point. He said:

SENATE AND HOUSE ARE COORDINATE AND OF EQUAL DIGNITY BUT FUNDAMENTALLY DIFFERENT

Our Founding Fathers very wisely provided for two distinct bodies in the Federal legislative branch. The House of Representatives, chosen on a population basis and constituting a large representative body, is fresh from the people as a result of elections every other year. The Senate, being a smaller and consequently much more deliberative body, with each State being represented by two Senators regardless of wide variations in population and area, has its membership elected for 6-year terms, with only one-third of the body being elected every 2 years.

Anyone making even a cursory study of the fundamental principles and aims and purposes which the framers of the Federal Constitution had in mind in providing for these two bodies—so vastly different in their size and basis of representation and terms of office and times of election—will recognize that, while the powers of the two Houses are coordinate, their methods of operation would, in many particulars, be vitally and fundamentally different.

LIMITATION OF DEBATE APPROPRIATE AND NECESSARY IN HOUSE BUT NOT IN SENATE

Obviously, anything like unlimited debate in any legislative body as large as the House of Representatives (numbering 435 Congressmen) would be completely out of the question. Consequently, limitation of debate in the House of Representatives is not only traditional and historical, but is also absolutely necessary in order to permit the House to operate.

By sharp contrast, however, the Senate, with a total membership of 96—substantially less than one-fourth of the number of the House—can operate efficiently and effectively without limitation of debate. In fact, the Senate has actually done so throughout its existence.

We must not let the Senate fall into the jungle of argument that majority rule may always produce justice. The present rules permit our committees to function after a session has expired. Our permanent functions are thus unimpaired. While a session has ended, our functions continue. We hold hearings. We make investigations. We make tours of inspection. We better inform and equip ourselves to legislate. All of these benefits we derive from our rules as they exist. Are we now to embark upon a course that may deprive us of these great advantages? Where will the next change come? Will we eventually destroy committee authorities between sessions?

One of the blessings of the freedoms we enjoy as American citizens finds its roots in the free discussions permitted by the Senate. Without the protection of law, rule or precedent, the rights of minorities are insecure. With unrestricted debate, hasty and ill-considered statutes are less likely. We know that we cannot add to human freedoms by taking away another freedom. Hence the freedom of discussion becomes in and of itself a most important freedom. Lacking such a freedom, a simple majority can quickly enforce its will—however unjust and untimely—upon the minority. What then may be a just decision, may thereafter prove unjust. Had the question been the subject of unrestrained debate, its faults and weaknesses might well have been disclosed to an unsuspecting public or to a busy Member of this body. What may be praised today, we may be forced to condemn tomorrow. Therefore, I urge patience, forbearance, soul searching, and grave consideration of every proposal which would weaken the citadel of our freedoms or destroy the structure that houses them. That structure is our rules.

We are told that a rule preventing immediate majority control is not democratic. The words "democratic" and "democracy" have been greatly abused. Their true meaning has often been distorted. The public at times is naturally confused in the loose use of these terms. We are a republic. We are representatives freely chosen by the States we honor and are privileged to represent. The Constitution does not guarantee our States a democratic form of government. It guarantees them a republican form of government, meaning, of course, a form of government which permits the people in our States to select their representatives who operate and control the governments established for them. Those governments vary in their separate constitutions and laws, but the pattern for all of them is essentially the same. So, therefore, to make that pattern more permanent, more durable, and the rights guaranteed under it more secure, often more than a mere majority of the legislative body is required for a change, as in amending our Constitution.

Such is the case with our rules. The accumulated wisdom of the past is wrapped up in them. Let us not discard it unless there is some compelling reason to do so. I know of no justification now. I can think of none. None has been presented to us. I charge that the proposed rules changes are supported by irresponsible elements outside the U.S. Senate so as to secure the passage of hasty, abusive, un-American legislation.

By relinquishing or destroying the right of unlimited debate, which has always been a bulwark against rash and hasty action, do we not give up more than we receive? The rule permitting free and unrestricted discussion was designed not to aid the majority of our Members, but, on the other hand, to protect those in the minority. It is one thing for a majority to vote passage of certain legislation; it is quite another thing for a majority to cut off one Senator or any minority group of Senators from defending or fighting legislation. It is, therefore, for minority rights that our rules should be preserved. We should weigh most carefully any effort to tamper with them.

Our rules have afforded the largest measure of freedom known to any legislative body in the history of mankind. Our rules have served us and the country so well that every emergency has been met and solved successfully. Every peril to our country has been overcome. Every right of every individual Member has remained unsullied. Why, then, should we change the known for the unknown and untried? The winds, gusts, and breezes of public opinion, sometimes fickle and oftentimes improperly founded, change from day to day, season to season, and session to session. Our rules should not be adjusted to meet these varying changes, if we are to be guided and protected by prudence, precedents, and well-conceived procedures.

Mr. President, I trust that the present membership of the Senate will not trifle with the beneficial effects of our rules, which are built upon 171 years of experience. Throughout these years many great Senators have stood here and defended the virtues and soundness of our rules. I recall the debates and the votes on January 4, 1957.

I hope we have not forgotten how the late Senator Robert A. Taft spoke with such telling effect in favor of continuing our rules and against all hasty changes. He was then the majority leader of the Senate.

I have read again the debates of January 4, 1957. Nothing has happened since then to alter my views. Nothing, it appears to me, has been presented to us requiring anyone to change the views then expressed. This was not a party issue then; it is not a party issue now. No thoughtful segment of our people is knocking at our doors clamoring for a change in our rules now.

I recall with much satisfaction how the distinguished minority leader in 1957, the able Senator from California, Mr. Knowland, joined hands, thought, and argument with our distinguished majority leader, the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON] to prevent a change in our rules. Their arguments, at least to me, were unanswerable and unanswered.

Controversial issues which may come before the Senate require the fullest time for study, examination, and explanation. Let us not hamstring ourselves and deprive us of the protection which our rules, throughout the years, have given to the rights of each minority group.

Patience now will achieve in the long run more than the rule of a mere majority vote. It has been so truly said:

Rage and frenzy will pull down more in a half of an hour, than prudence, deliberation and foresight can build up in a hundred years.

How true is the counsel of those words in the issue now before the Senate. Have we the wisdom and the foresight to heed them? Our votes now will determine our judgment before the country. Let us, I urge Senators, remain steadfast to principle and protect the rights of minorities by maintaining our present rules.

As the Saturday Evening Post in the title to its editorial opposing changes in rule XXII, which I read to the Senate Friday, has so aptly put it:

Some day freedom may depend on a Senate filibuster.

Should we do away with unlimited debate today, and freedom were to depend upon a filibuster tomorrow, then, my colleagues, we will have lost freedom today—not tomorrow.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield 10 minutes to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. COTTON. I thank the Senator from Texas.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD an article entitled "The Senate and Its Rules," which was published in the Saturday Evening Post of June 27, 1925. The article was written by former U.S. Senator George H. Moses, of New Hampshire, who was then the President pro tempore of this body.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE SENATE AND ITS RULES

(By George H. Moses, Senior U.S. Senator From New Hampshire and President Pro Tempore of the Senate)

1. HISTORICAL

Piled neatly at the end of the desk of the Presiding Officer in the Senate Chamber are half a dozen books. One of them, as slender as a poet's first sheaf, and probably better thumbed, contains the Standing Rules—which have stood now without substantial change since the foundation of the Government and which, in my opinion, are as firmly footed today as at any time.

These rules are only 40 in number; and their structure, to use a word which nowadays is applied to everything from a schedule of tariff rates to a skyscraper, is very simple. They provide for the order of business, for the precedence of motions, for the formation and functions of committees, and for the conduct of debate. It is toward this last that present criticism is leveled.

Debate in the Senate in its early days had few restraints. The previous question existed, but in a rudimentary form only as modern parliamentarians would regard it. It was itself debatable; it could not be used upon amendments; nor could it be applied while sitting in Committee of the Whole. In this form it stood in the Senate rules for 17 years, during which it was moved only 4 times and only 3 times carried. The revision of the rules in 1806 did not specifically provide against the previous question; it simply was not mentioned at all, and the sanction of 119 years of usage is that it does not exist.

At any rate, no Senator has yet had sufficient temerity to move the previous question; and it is significant that practically all of the nearly 100 efforts which have been made for the amendment of the rules have had the previous question as a base line. This agitation, therefore, is not new. Henry Clay, in the 27th Congress, started the long procession; but neither he nor any of his imitators has achieved great success, since only four of the proposals have been adopted. Two of these were produced by war necessity, and one of the twain was discarded when the war was over. Two of them remain and are regularly made use of, and the fourth has been applied only twice. Only one of the quartet has been fortunate enough to perpetuate the name of its author, and it is to Mr. Anthony's credit that the Senate proceeds always on Mondays to the call of the calendar under rule VIII. This rule provides that unobjected bills upon the calendar shall be taken up in order and that no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 5 minutes. Toward the end of a session unanimous-consent agreements are had for more frequent sittings under rule VIII, and it is by means of this rule that the great bulk of the business of the Senate is advanced—an aid thereto, it should be remarked, being a Presiding Officer who is really on his job.

Debate in the Senate seems to provoke more debate outside the Chamber than within it, and I say this notwithstanding the oceans of talk which have so often lapped my feet as I have sat in the chair. I admit that it becomes a bit monotonous to be compelled to listen to the same speech every day for a long period. That frequently happens in campaigning, when it is part of the game; and there is no complaint. So I cannot see that the unlimited debate in the Senate, with its admitted repetition, is really such an irritant as some would have us believe.

2. PURPOSE OF SENATE

Cooling the tea of legislation

That debate in the Senate has departed from its earlier manner none will deny. When the Chamber resounded to the voices of the mighty, debate was a matter of much solemnity. Proponents of a measure, having amply prepared themselves and, as rumor has had it, having amply fortified themselves, would arise, address the Chair, and go to it, for hours at a time, in sonorous phrases such as now would empty the Chamber in short order; and the opponents of the measure would follow suit. These men took all the time they needed or wanted to develop their argument, to use the words that are so often employed by campaign orators; and when they had done so the debate closed and a vote was taken. It is scarcely different in the Senate today. Debate, to be sure, no longer surges in long combers of eloquence. It presents the surface of a much more choppy sea. I remember one day a western Senator—being incessently asked to yield for a question or for some hostile interjection into the midst of his speech, which he had plainly prepared with painstaking care—who voiced his opinion of these other customs of other days by exclaiming digustedly, "Mr. President, debate in the Senate nowadays has degenerated into mere conversation." Nevertheless, in the great majority of cases debate in the Senate continues to be real debate. The offenders against whom outcry is directed but whom nobody has yet chosen to name are few in number—and they are innocuous. At the door of none of them can anyone truthfully lay the blame for the defeat of any measure genuinely beneficial to the country by reason of his misuse of the rules of the Senate.

3. PUBLIC SENTIMENT NOT DEFEATED

And the rules of the Senate likewise are equally innocent of such a charge. If I were speaking on what one of my more voluble colleagues likes to term "the hustings," I would use the language of that forum and challenge anyone to point out a measure of real advantage to the country which has ever been defeated or even unduly delayed in its enactment through the operation of the Senate rules. But I am writing for the reflective readers of a great periodical, who constitute the largest cross section of those who will ultimately pass upon this question; and I desist. But I am willing to say that within my own close observation of the Senate and its modus operandi I have seen more than one disastrous or costly measure prevented from passage simply because its opponents have known how to use the Senate rules. Sometimes—yes, indeed frequently—it is not necessary to use the rules for these good purposes at all. I well remember a Senator of high character, great ability and large determination once arising when his colleagues were discussing whether to take up a measure of dubious consequence, and remarking significantly, "It will take some time to dispose of it." The bill was not taken up, and the Treasury was saved a good many million dollars.

The so-called filibusters in the Senate have not been numerous. From the 27th Congress in 1841—when, by the way, Mr. Clay made the first of the nearly 100 vain efforts which have been made since 1806 to amend the rules—from 1841 to 1917 there have been only 19 occasions when a real filibuster has taken place in the Senate. The first of these may serve to show that even the giants of the golden days of the Senate were men of like passions as we who now sit in their seats; for they spent more than a week discussing the ousting of some Senate printers. But the main truth remains: None of these filibusters produced real harm to the country—though my partisan sensibilities were greatly outraged by some of the results, notably in the failure of the so-called Force bill in 1891. To this measure a change in the Senate rules as now proposed will doubtless be as a blast from Gabriel's horn; and it requires no lively imagination to foresee other measures of less and of momentary importance which will be driven through under whip and spur if cloture becomes the rule of the Senate as it is in the House, where I have seen a measure involving scores of millions of annual expenditure for all time to come put through with only 40 minutes of debate and the time parceled out by the opposing leaders. The founder of this journal, speaking in the Constitutional Convention, and using words suited to the polite customs of that day, described the Senate as the saucer into which the tea of legislation would be poured for cooling before drinking. This purpose the Senate has served admirably by reason of its rules; and if these rules are now to be changed as demanded I fear that many a hot and scalding draught will be poured down the throat of the country.

4. PROTECTION OF MINORITIES

The voice of the people

This will surely prove the case if the character of Federal legislation continues as it is now. Time was when debate in the Senate dealt with the Constitution, with the questions leading to its interpretation, with the constructive problems which every new nation must attack with great questions of general policy, and with the sharp demarcation which marked our public affairs under a well-established two-party system. Now the two-party system is subject to some dilution, to say the least. The introduction of the direct primary and the popular election of Senators—devices with which I have no personal quarrel, for they have served me well enough—tend to make Senators more attentive to what they think to be the voice of the people than to any sense of party responsibility. Such is the enginery of propaganda and publicity nowadays that it is small wonder if a Senator who receives, as many of us do, 200 telegrams of a morning urging him to vote thus or so, begins to think that his State is aflame over some pending legislation and that it behooves him to move properly because each step brings him nearer to the next primary. It is said in that je-t which so often carries the true word within it, that one Senator, on receipt of over 20 telegrams in one day on the same subject, will think this State already arming itself to march, Coxeywise, to Washington to enforce its demands. Suppose, since a record vote in the Senate rarely discloses more than 80 Senators present, suppose there should be 40 more like this man—and cloture in effect. When the advocates of stricter enforcement of the 18th amendment begin to realize what cloture means to them, do not forget that there are organizations which can readily be formed to move under the 15th amendment also.

The present-day character of Federal legislation is, as I have said, vastly different from the legislation of even a generation ago. Then Congress met, passed the supply bills, indulged in some partisan discussion, sometimes struck out on a new line of policy—like the Interstate Commerce Act, for example—and went home, where its Members could be sure of remaining peacefully for at least half of their time. Beginning in 1909 and continuing to 1915, Congress was rarely out of session; and from then till now there have occured only three of the six long recesses which Congress should have granted to the country. Passing the days of the war, it is safe to say that most of the days of these prolonged sessions were devoted to the discussion of proposals which had for their main object the expenditure of public money for purposes which are, many of them, good in themselves, but which never swam within the ken of the most far-visioned of the Founding Fathers.

That is to say, the acts of Congress now are proposed and fashioned in acordance with the economic necessities of groups of individuals or groups of States who find a centripetal force in the changing conception of the functions of the Federal Government and who come to Congress to demand those things which, a generation ago, they would have been too proud to ask anyone to do for them, and when they would have done these things themselves or would have practiced the now-forgotten virtue of self-denial.

No small factor in producing this result has been the changing character of Federal taxation. A generation ago the Nation existed, and existed well and happily, upon revenues which were created by an indirect taxation which fell chiefly upon those who voluntarily exposed themselves to it, and by a direct taxation which fell heavily upon none. The war changed all that. The necessity for raising huge sums, and from a people who were speedily taught to pay in other ways until it hurt, gave us a system of taxation which, whatever may be said for it as in the days for which it was devised, is ill-conditioned to serve the country well now that those days are past. Whatever reforms we have been able to institute in our tax system have not been impeded by the rules of the Senate; but I very much fear that the further tax reform for which the country has need may be greatly delayed, if not wholly prevented, if the rules of the Senate are undertaken to be changed.

The tax system under which this country now lives is so devised that nearly two-thirds of all the Federal revenue is provided by six industrious and thrifty States. These States have 12 Senators. The other 42 States, which pay only about one-third of the Federal taxes and among whom arise the component elements which dilute our party system and give rise to the blocs which harass us, have 84 Senators; and the only defense which the 12 Senators from the tax-paying States may use for the protection of their people's pocket is found in the rules of the Senate with their provision for unlimited debate. It would be unfair to assert, and I would not wish to have anyone think that I believe, that all the 84 Senators whom I have thus grouped would act together to mulct their colleagues' constituencies, for I chance to be among the 84 myself, although my little State happens to pay exactly the same per capita of Federal tax as the great State of New York. But I have too often seen a majority of the Senate swung together under selfish leadership for the purpose of preventing proper reform in the tax system, to wish to give that power into their hands under a change in the rules which would take from the rest of us the only weapon which we may properly use. Twelve Senators, under cloture, would be helpless against any assault upon their principles or upon the interests of their constituents. But 12 determined Senators, acting under the existing rules of the Senate, can save and often have saved the country from disaster. And I would have it known that I am not referring now to the "little group of 12 willful men" who prevented the passage of the armed ships bill in the closing days of the 64th Congress—although it is worth noting, in passing, that that was an unnecessary proposal for legislation, since its whole purpose was a little later made effective by an Executive order, the validity of which was never questioned.

This episode, however, did produce the form of cloture which now exists in the rules of the Senate and which was adopted under the pressure of approaching war and upon the insistence of a masterful Executive. Rule XXII provides that whenever 16 Senators shall sign a motion to close debate upon any pending measure the question is at once stated by the Presiding Officer. It thus becomes a special order, lying over till the next day but one, when, 1 hour after the Senate meets, the roll is called to ascertain the presence of a quorum and an aye-and-nay vote is taken, without debate, on the question, "Is it the sense of the Senate that the debate shall be brought to a close?" If the affirmative prevails by a two-thirds vote, the pending measure becomes the exclusive business before the Senate, and no Senator may speak more than 1 hour in all upon the main question or upon any collateral question which may arise. Nor, under the practice of the Senate, may any Senator yield his time to a colleague; so that, if every Senator should avail himself of his full time, there could be only 96 hours more of debate.

This rule has been in effect for 8 years. Yet it has been made use of, as I recall, only twice. Its application was threatened for a third time, but proved unnecessary.

There is another form of cloture in the Senate to which recourse is frequently had. This is through the use of the unanimous-consent agreement by which so much of the business of the Senate proceeds. By this means an hour is fixed for beginning to vote on a measure and its amendments, without further debate, while in the meantime Senators are limited in the number of times they may speak and in the length of time they may consume. So frequently is this device made use of that it has been charged that no business may be advanced in the Senate save by unanimous consent. This would indeed be a grievous fault, if true. But the fact is that less than 20 percent of the Senate may produce a gag for the remainder of their colleagues, and two-thirds of those voting may terminate debate at will. Under this procedure the right of the majority to legislate is unimpeded and the rights of the minority receive some measure of protection. The evil of rule XXII—to which, by the way, no specific amendment has yet been suggested—and of the unanimous-consent agreement in the form in which it is usually drawn, is that the Senate finds itself compelled to vote, without debate, upon important amendments which sometimes have not been printed and concerning which there may be had no word either of illumination or of opposition. This constitutes a real impediment to wise legislation; and I do not see how it can be remedied by any amendment to the rules.

After all, it is wise legislation which the country wants; and the real test of the rules of the Senate is to determine whether, on the whole, they have contributed to or have hindered this. Senator Henry Cabot Lodge came to the Senate 32 years ago, fresh from an experience in the House of Representatives, where he had been a forceful figure in the contest which established the so-called Reed rules. He was an exceptionally well-informed man, but his knowledge of the Senate rules and of their general effect was naturally limited. He came to the Senate, too, at a time when one of its most famous filibusters—on the silver purchase bill—was being set in motion. This filibuster began on August 29, 1893, and it was not until October 31 that a vote could be had. In the November number of the North American Review, Senator Lodge expressed his opinion of what he termed "obstruction in the Senate." Plainly, he wrote this paper while the filibuster was in progress; and it is equally clear that he wrote it in the light of his experience in the House. He set up the axiom that "to vote without debating is perilous, but to debate and never vote is imbecile." Before his paper was printed, however, the silver purchase bill had been voted upon, and the side of Mr. Lodge was in the majority. In his later years Mr. Lodge freely acknowledged that if a vote on this measure had come earlier than it did, free silver would have undoubtedly won, even though the filbuster had been carried on by its friends, who at no time had accurate knowledge of how the Senate really stood on the question. Surely it will not be argued, even by the shrillest of those who clamor for a change in the rules, that the Senate rules prevented wise legislation in this instance; and Mr. Lodge himself before long came to see the usefulness, in spite of their frequent irritations, of the Senate rules.

Where the disaster?

Nor can it be truthfully said of any of the notable filibusters to which the Senate rules have given occasion that it has resulted in unwise legislation or has resulted in a real and permanent defeat of wise legislation. The bill to recharter the Bank of the United States failed; the Oregon bill was delayed; the Blair education bill failed; the Force bill failed; the free silver bill was repealed; two rivers and harbors bills failed; two ship-subsidy bills failed; the ship purchase bill failed; the armed ships bill failed; numerous appropriation bills have failed; the Treaty of Versailles was not ratified. What one of these measures can be said to be really necessary to the welfare of the country? The defeat of what one of them has brought any irremediable disaster to our people? Some of these measures I have favored. Some of them I have opposed. Yet, in the long view, I cannot feel that the Senate rules in any of these instances have permitted an irreparable outrage upon my susceptibilities.

It will be noted how large a proportion of the filibusters enumerated have had to do with the appropriation of money; and the most picturesque filibuster I have ever witnessed in the Senate was of this character. It marked the conclusion of the 65th Congress, in March 1919. That session of Congress had been a remarkable one in many ways. It followed upon the election of 1918, when the Republicans had carried both the Senate and the House of Representatives in the face of President Wilson's appeal for a Democratic majority to enable him to stand as the untrammeled spokesman of his country. The Constitution, however, lays some trammels, even upon the President, and the Republicans in Congress were in no gentle frame of mind when they came together in December. The Democrats were apprehensive—and began putting themselves in a posture of defense. Among other things, they made the tax law unchangeable for 2 years, an unheard-of proceeding. And they sought further to fortify themselves against the lean years which they saw ahead by holding appropriations at the wartime peak. For this purpose the Army and Navy appropriation bills were admirably suited, and when these measures came to the Senate they were found to contain items which would have kept thousands of men busy at wartime wages in time of peace up to July 1920, with political consequences which are plain to even the unpractical mind. There were other measures of like character.

The concealed filibuster

The Republicans, then for the first time under the leadership of Senator Lodge, were anxious to make the earliest possible use of their newly acquired majority; and it was determined to prolong the debate in order to throw over the objectionable appropriation bills beyond the fourth of March, which would compel the President to summon the new Congress in extra session, prior to June thirtieth, when the annual appropriation bills reach their limit of time. Accordingly, a "concealed filibuster" was organized, and it succeeded admirably. No one could have said that the ensuing debate was not legitimate. It transcended no rule of relevancy, and it proceeded to the very eve of adjournment. Then, early in the evening of March third, the filibuster emerged from its concealment, and three Senators—Sherman of Illinois, La Follette of Wisconsin, and France of Maryland—undertook to hold the floor until the following noon. Their undertaking was successful—so successful, indeed, that the tensity of feeling among the majority found sardonic expression in the words of Vice President Marshall, who, at the stroke of noon, halted the last of the filibusters by declaring the Senate of the 65th Congress adjourned sine deo, instead of sine die.

And it may be here noted, as one may find by consulting the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, that these filibustering speeches, though consuming in time, were real arguments, reading well even today, and not departing too far from any rule of relevancy.

Upon the summoning of the extra session, in May following, the appropriation bills which had been thrown over were taken up de novo, shorn of their objectionable features, and the Treasury was saved many hundreds of millions of dollars. Whom did the rules of the Senate then injure save the tax eaters who lost their jobs? And if the rules of the Senate are to be judged upon their whole record for the 119 years that they have stood as they are, we never can say that they have in the long run done harm to any real interest of the country. Of course, if the Republic is not to endure and if the fabric of our institutions is to come crashing down about our ears because this or that bill may not be passed instanter, then equally of course we should change the rules of the Senate and change them speedily.

But what should the change consist in, even under such circumstances of importunity? To restore the previous question, under the assumption that it will be made use of more frequently now than formerly, will not be enough. Because a filibuster may depend quite as much upon a use as an abuse of the rules. For example, in the closing days of the 67th Congress a filibuster raised its menacing hand, and a Senator of the minority started what everybody knew would be a very long speech. In the midst of it and in order to spell the orator, another minority Senator suggested the absence of a quorum. Result, a call of the roll, prior to which several Senators friendly to the filibuster left the Chamber. The rollcall showed no quorum was present, and a motion to adjourn was entered, necessitating another rollcall which defeated the motion. Another suggestion of no quorum followed, with another rollcall; and no quorum was found. Thereupon it was moved that the Sergeant at Arms request the presence of the absentees. Another rollcall, upon which this motion prevailed. The Sergeant at Arms went upon his courteous but fruitless errand; meanwhile the Senate stood still. It was then moved that the absent Senators be compelled to attend under process, which necessitated another rollcall, during the progress of which enough Senators of the majority entered the Chamber to make a quorum, as still another rollcall developed. It was then moved to take a recess, and a rollcall defeated that motion. Meantime, several Senators had again taken themselves away and a quorum was again demanded. Then the whole process was again painfully rehashed and 5½ hours were thus consumed.

Again, when the Dyer antilynching bill was before the Senate, a filibuster was started and frankly admitted as such by a Senator who now wants the rules changed. This filibuster addressed itself to the question of approving the Journal, which is the first business at each adjourned session of the Senate. By tactics such as I have outlined in the preceding paragraph the minority wore away many hours and days; and at length the Senator in charge of the bill was compelled to withdraw it if anything was to be done with the really necessary program of the session.

All these proceedings were had under rules which are not subject to attack, which are essential to the conduct of the legitimate business of the Senate, but which must be amended if the clamor for business methods in the Senate—whatever these may be—is to be heeded. A rule of relevancy can do nothing in situations such as I have described, and the only remedy which I can see is to provide against procedure which may be classed as dilatory. But if relevancy and undilatoriness—the word is understandable, even if freshly coined—are to rule the Senate henceforward, who is to determine them? The Vice President? Hell 'n' Maria. The President pro tempore? I beg to be excused. The Senate itself? Then indeed will it come true as whimsically declared so often by Vice President Marshall—the rules of the Senate are what a majority of the Senate from day to day declare them to be.

Adapting the present rules

There is much more than a half truth in Mr. Marshall's assertion. For example, let me show by a recent episode how the Senate may interpret its rules, even now, to fit the mood of a moment. When the nomination of Mr. Warren to be Attorney General was before the Senate for the first time a motion was made in executive session—and I may tell this because the injunction of secrecy has been removed from the transaction—to consider the question in open session. Being in the chair at the time I held that this motion implied such a change in the rules as to require a two-thirds vote to adopt it. From this ruling an appeal was taken, and in the debate which followed every good Parliamentarian in the Senate agreed with the Chair and a majority of the whole Senate, including the maker of the motion, voted to sustain the ruling. The necessary two-thirds were found to adopt the motion, it should be added.

Less than a week later, Mr. Warren's name having been sent in again after its first rejection, a like motion was made and I, being again in the chair, cited the previous ruling and the action of the Senate and held as before. Again an appeal was taken, and this time eight of the Senators who had voted with the Chair before voted to override his decision, and the appeal was successful.

Therefore, why all this pother about the rules of the Senate? The hand that cut so much redtape in France has surely not yet lost the feel of the shears. All that is necessary is for the Vice President to hold, some day, that a long-winded Senator is irrelevant. An appeal will be taken from this ruling and, if a majority of the Senators vote to sustain the Chair, the trick is turned—until next time, as I have just shown by the Warren case.

To change the language of the rules, however, is quite another matter. Such change can be adopted only under proceedings conducted within the rules as they are, and I have already pointed out the parliamentary pitfalls which exist under senatorial rules which nobody dreams of changing. Add to these the possibility of interminable debate, recall that one determined southern Senator has already announced his purpose to read the reports of the Patent Office to his colleagues if cloture is attempted, and I cannot escape the conclusion that the present agitation, even if its objective is necessary or desirable, comes at an inopportune moment. The pressing public question for the present Congress to solve is the extent and the manner of relief from the burden of taxation which now oppresses our people, stifling their enterprise and hampering their initiative in business.

This tax question cannot wait upon the months of struggle which will attend any effort to change the rules of the Senate. And, I may add, the settlement of this question will not be impeded by the Senate rules as they are if a majority of the Senate are determined that tax reform shall be had.

Too many laws

The trouble with the Senate does not lie with its rules. It lies in the inattention of Senators to their business. I venture to assert that any time when 49 Senators will go to the Chamber determined to stay there or within call until a measure upon which they are agreed has been passed, that measure will not be overlong in coming to passage. But Senators will not do this, as I once learned from experience. In the course of the 67th Congress a question arose in which the administration was deeply interested. President Harding asked me what I thought could be done to expedite the matter, and I agreed to undertake securing the signatures of 49 Senators to an agreement to come to the Chamber on a given day prepared to stay there or within call until the opposition to the bill was broken down. With the aid of Senator Capper, of Kansas, I secured 51 signatures, and the paper, when placed in the hands of Senator Lodge, the majority leader, gave him high hope—which was dashed on the very first rollcall, which disclosed the absence of more than a dozen of the Senators who had signed up to stand by.

If the Senate, and its presiding officer as well, will stay on the job, the business of the Senate will proceed very well under its rules as they now are.

Again I ask, why all this pother about the rules of the Senate? What is the great idea?

In each Congress there are presented 20,000 bills, in round numbers. Is it sought to enact more of these than we now do? I am well aware of the large number of people in this country whose sovereign remedy for every ill, public, private, economic, or industrial, is: Pass a law. Pass a law and, even if the law is inert, costly to administer, subversive of sound, legal, or fiscal principle, all will be well. I am not of this school. I believe we pass too many laws now; and I certainly do not intend to make it easier to pass more. In addition, I have learned, from observation and experience, that a filibuster is a horrid thing only when it is directed against a bill in which I am interested, and is a lovely thing always when employed against a bill to which I am opposed. How many of my countrymen are different?

Mr. COTTON. Mr. President, the reason I have taken the liberty of asking that the article be printed in the body of the RECORD is that, in my opinion, it is not merely a voice out of the past, but it contains some exceedingly pungent and cogent comments on the rules of the Senate made at a time when the Senate was not acting under the shadow of the particular situations which today prevail in this body.

Senator Moses was one of the great Presidents pro tempore of the Senate of the United States. Incidentally, the first President pro tempore of this body was John Langdon, of New Hampshire, and the last President pro tempore which our State furnished this body was my able colleague, the distinguished senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES].

I shall avail myself of perhaps even less than the remaining minutes allotted to me to comment on the situation before us and on the so-called Johnson resolution. I think it has been increasingly evident, as the debate has progressed in the past few days, that, either consciously or unconsciously, the Senate, and certainly the public, as indicated by their expressions and their letters, have fallen into the fallacy of considering the rules of the Senate in the light of only one present controversy, namely, the controversy on civil rights. Yet it should be borne in mind that since 1919 cloture has been either invoked or attempted to be invoked—and the latter usually is as effective as the former in hastening the decision of questions and bringing them to a vote—on foreign treaties, the World Court, banking bills, labor bills, an atomic energy bill, and various other measures, including spending and taxing measures which have come before this great body.

PURPOSE OF RULE

The twofold purpose underlying the rules of the Senate throughout the years of its existence, and reiterated again and again by some of the great parliamentarians of this body, is, first, the tradition of the Senate to prevent heedless and headlong action by majorities; second, the preservation of the rights and the protection of the people of the various States. I am not speaking about States rights. I am speaking about the fact that the Senate has a function to perform. If the Senate ever ceases to perform that function, the purpose and meaning of the Senate may cease to exist, and we may as well have a unicameral legislature.

Much has been said about the rules and the procedure in the other body. As one who served for many years in the other body, I may suggest that while those rules are well applicable to the House of Representatives, they must never apply to the Senate, because the Senate is the gathering of the representatives of sovereign States. The fact that the Senate requires meticulous courtesy among its Members is not a mere idle thing or idle gesture. Its underlying purpose is the fact that we are dealing with ambassadors, if you will, from the sovereign States of the Union.

This not not simply a matter of protecting the people of small States. It is not simply a matter of protecting the people of any particular section.

I should like to remind the Senate that according to a report of the Tax Foundation, which is based on statistics of the Department of Commerce, six States of the Union now pay one-half of all the revenues received by the United States of America. Those 6 States have 12 Senators in this body. In other words, when it comes to the matter of taxation, when it comes to the matter of spending the revenue which comes from the people of 6 States in the Union, those people have the protection of only 12 Senators.

SMALL STATES PROTECTED

It does, however, apply in regard to small States, because those of us who represent small States know, if we have ever served in the House of Representatives, that our voices there are very feeble when raised against those representing the State of New York, for example, which State has 43 Members in the House. So, by the same token, the small States of the Union, under this Federal system, are like watertight compartments of a ship. The purpose was to deal with the growing population of this great Nation, and the resultant problems.

If there is one thing that is obvious, and it has been substantiated by a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, it is, whatever may be said by Walter Reuther or anybody else, the fundamental purpose in creating this body in such manner that two-thirds would be continuing over sessions was to give us stability. Otherwise, all one would have to do would be to oppose the seating of new Senators, one by one, at the start of any session, to defer and delay legislation.

Important, too, is the matter of the actual two-thirds necessary to invoke cloture, as proposed in the pending resolution, instead of the constitutional two-thirds. It has been said in the Senate that there may not be any material difference between two-thirds of those present and voting and a constitutional two-thirds, because of the fact that probably most Senators would be present and voting when the critical hour came, when the cloture was to be invoked. But there is this difference: Under the present system, the constitutional two-thirds provisions puts a premium on absenteeism. It means one Senator who remains away, whether necessarily or of his own volition, can nullify two votes. By changing the rule to a requirement of two-thirds of a quorum present and voting, the premium on absenteeism is avoided, and the rule, in my own opinion, is materially, properly, and logically improved.

Mr. President, from a background starting 35 years ago, when as a secretary to Senator Moses while he was President pro tempore of this body, I listened well to the debates that arose in those days, and I remember well the time he was working on this very subject; the question of the Senate's rules has been instilled in me throughout the years.

I feel that the protection of our States, and of all the people, is more dependent upon maintaining the continuity of these rules than on any other act we can take. I shall vote for the Johnson resolution, not because of its effect upon any present controversy, but from the long viewpoint of years ahead.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I yield the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER] 20 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, debate in the Senate during the past few days has once again demonstrated to me that the arguments advanced for revising rule XXII are not realistic or even reasonable, but are founded upon emotion, and, to a large extent, upon a propensity among some Members of this body to play politics with questions and issues about which they have little or no practical knowledge.

It is no secret that the main reason the so-called liberal advocates of a revised cloture rule have become so vociferous in their demands is their overwhelming obsession for more stringent, more obnoxious so-called civil rights legislation. In the past, they have been unable to obtain the force bills they demand, since the representatives of the areas these bills would affect the most have had available means whereby the entire Nation might be alerted to the dangerous poison which lies beneath the sugarcoating of these legislative monstrosities—bills such as part III of the 1957 civil rights bill and the Federal fair employment practices legislation, to name but a few.

In other words, Mr. President, it is my contention that advocates of a change in rule XXII have held opponents of their plan up to public contempt and ridicule, have labeled the southern delegations as "obstructionist" and sectional, solely and simply in the course of a purely political effort.

Yet, as a practical matter, it is they who are being sectional. After all, the legislation they demand is purely sectional in character. It is directed first and foremost at the people of the South.

What proponents of these force bills would like is to be able to point the dagger of sectional legislation at the throat of the South, secure in knowledge that all weapons available to the South's elected representatives have been effectively abolished.

What is there about the civil rights issue, Mr. President, that seems to make some completely lose their sense of perspective—yes, their sense of reason?

Take the Supreme Court, for example, Mr. President. Just 4½ years ago, the Court was called upon to rule again upon the issue of separate but equal schools. How logical, how sound it would have been for the Court to follow long-established jurisprudence and hold that public facilities for the white and Negro races need only be separate but equal.

Instead, acting upon impulses similar, if not identical, to those motivating the rules-change advocates today, the Court threw caution to the winds, abandoned logic law, and stare decisis, and introduced the inexact, speculative and disputed issues of psychology and sociology into the basic jurisprudence of American constitutional law. This unwarranted decision has caused much strife, and I seriously doubt that integration will ever be forced down the throats of an unwilling people.

One would think, Mr. President, that some Members of the Congress would have learned the lesson this experience has taught. Unfortunately, such has not been the case. Reason is laid aside; prudence has succumbed to expediency; the fires of sectionalism burn fiercely in the Chambers of both Houses of Congress.

I do not mean to be facetious, Mr. President, but events of the past few years have often compelled me to believe that too many people have become so ensnared in the nets of their own making that they have lost completely their sense of reason.

Take the issue of majority rule, for example.

Proponents of easy cloture in the Senate cry vociferously for majority rule. Events have demonstrated that they want majority rule in order to force upon the people of one area of our country a number of Supreme Court decisions, among other things, which run directly counter to the wishes of the citizens those decisions most directly affect.

Yet, what was the source of those decions? The Supreme Court—nine men.

If Supreme Court rulings, handed down by nine men, upsetting longstanding principles of law, are consistent with the liberal demand for majority rule, then the system of mathematics I was taught in school has certainly been greatly changed.

Nine out of 170 million cannot be a majority.

The proponents of a gag rule in the Senate make a great hue and cry about their desire to protect minority groups in the Nation. I ask, Mr. President, just how inconsistent can anyone get?

Here we see a supposedly reasonable group of men demanding complete majority rule, rule which would destroy what few rights minorities still possess, in order to purportedly protect the rights of minorities.

But the best is yet to come, Mr. President. Let me illustrate the extent to which expediency controls the councils of those who want to change the Senate rules.

During recent months, the press has been filled with learned expressions by proponents of changing the Senate rules to the effect that the Senate is not a continuing body. Of course, the so-called liberal group has advocated abrogation of long-standing Senate precedents solely and simply as a means to change rule XXII in order to achieve their ultimate ends—namely, the passage of radical force bills. As a matter of fact, a long and detailed brief was filed with the Vice President of the United States by this group, explaining in detail why they believed the Senate is not a continuing body.

Yet, not too many months ago, the Senate had that very issue before it, and quite a few of those who today clamor that the Senate is not a continuing body voted to the effect that the Senate continued from Congress to Congress.

I refer, of course, to the censure of the late Senator McCarthy from Wisconsin.

I do not intend to reopen the merits or demerits of that event, Mr. President. It is all water under the bridge.

However, as a coldly practical matter, the issue of censuring Senator McCarthy boiled down to nothing more than whether the Senate was a continuing body.

Specifically, during debate on the censure resolution, the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] offered an amendment to the censure resolution, which amendment read in part:

> With respect to the report and recommendations of the select committee, a reasonable doubt exists as to the authority of the Senate to censure or condemn a Senator for language or conduct in a prior session of the Congress; * * * (100 C.R. 16327–16328).

Thus, the issue of continuity was squarely before the Senate.

In this connection, Mr. President, it is interesting today to compare the 1954 rollcall on a question involving whether or not the Senate is a continuing body, with the rollcall this year on substantially the same issue. Here is what we find: Many Senators voted against the Dirksen amendment—involving the issue of Senate continuity—in order to censure the late junior Senator from Wisconsin back in 1954. Yet 13 of those Senators changed their vote this year, in an effort to label the Senate as a noncontinuing body, in order to secure quick and easy passage of "force" bills. With this record before me, I am compelled to conclude that since the basic issue was substantially the same, the motive involved made the difference, that is, there is a willingness among so-called liberals to regard the Senate as a continuing body for the purpose of the 1954 censure resolution, but, again, as a noncontinuing body where rule XXII and civil rights legislation may be involved. These are the Senators who voted against the 1954 Dirksen amendment, and against the recent Johnson motion to table the Anderson resolution, which would have declared the Senate not to be a continuing body: AIKEN, ANDERSON, BUSH, COOPER, DOUGLAS, HENNINGS, HUMPHREY, JACKSON, MAGNUSON, MORSE, PASTORE, SMITH, and SYMINGTON.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that this one example leads us inevitably to the conclusion that rule XXII should not be changed, that some fixed and concrete protection must be provided against illogical and unreasonable shifts in majority opinions based upon the expediences of any given time.

We would do well to refer again at this point to the writings of Madison, one of the principal architects of the Constitution, in the Federalist Papers.

The following is from "The Federalist," No. 63, dealing with the Senate, and it is written by Madison:

> Thus far I have considered the circumstances which point out the necessity of a well-constructed Senate only as they relate to the representatives of the people. To a people as little blinded by prejudice or corrupted by flattery as those whom I address, I shall not scruple to add, that such an institution may be sometimes necessary as a defense to the people against their own temporary errors and delusions. As the cool and deliberate sense of the community ought, in all governments, and actually will, in all free governments, ultimately prevail over the views of its rulers; so there are particular moments in public affairs when the people, stimulated by some irregular passion, or some illicit advantage, or misled by the artful misrepresentations of interested men, may call for measures which they themselves will afterwards be the most ready to lament and condemn. In these critical moments, how salutary will be the interference of some temperate and respectable body of citizens, in order to check the misguided career, and to suspend the blow meditated by the people against themselves, until reason, justice, and truth can regain their authority over the public mind? What bitter anguish would not the people of Athens have often escaped if their government had contained so provident a safeguard against the tyranny of their own passions? Popular liberty might then have escaped the indelible reproach of decreeing to the same citizens the hemlock on one day and status on the next.

Read against the avowed purpose of the proponents of rules-change today, Mr. President, the excerpt from "The Federalist" I have just quoted reemphasizes the need for continuation of rule XXII as now constituted, not its repeal or modification. Rule XXII, I might add, is the only protection the people have against momentary desires based not upon thoughtful reflection, but upon emotion, yes politics.

Of course, we have heard the argument often that unlimited debate, or the threat of unlimited debate, frustrates the majority in the execution of its will. I submit, Mr. President, that if, in fact, such a frustration does occur, it results from the basic constitutional principles upon which our Government is founded—it is a direct result of the need for protection of minorities against the overwhelming power of pure majority rule.

This is obviously the case in connection with the present debate. I want to compliment the so-called liberal bloc in the Senate for being honest and above board. While they base their case most often upon the argument for majority rule they are quite frank in admitting that the reason they want majority rule is in order to permit the expeditious passage of so-called civil rights bills. As matters now stand, they feel they are hindered, either directly or indirectly, by the existence of a determined minority opposed to their legislative demands. They recognize that the minority which opposes them is bolstered by the wishes of the people they represent, and have available one of the most potent weapons available to any free people, that is, the means and ability to arouse public opinion, given a sufficient time to do so.

Hence, the liberal bloc, in order to work its will, would strip its minority opponents of the weapons they now possess.

This, according to their viewpoint, is an absolute necessity in order for their collective will to prevail. However, even while I commend my friends in opposition to me on their candor, I would remind them that they have dug for themselves a deep and dark legislative pit and are rapidly pushing one another over the side into it.

Philosophers from the time of Aristotle have warned against pure majority rule. The gist of such arguments is the changing composition of a majority. In other words, a majority on one issue is quite often a minority on another. Given pure majority rule, it is eventually possible for a hard-core minority, by combining with other minorities, on a given issue, to control the course of legislation—thus achieving the actual effect of minority rule under the guise of majority power.

Aside from the purely philosophical arguments against what is attractively termed "majority rule," I believe my good friends who so glibly and frequently demand the amendment of rule XXII should take cognizance of the fact that they, themselves, have frequently used the protection extended to minorities for their own purposes. In brief, they have utilized rule XXII in order to block action on legislation to which they might be opposed just as those of us who have opposed so-called civil rights legislation have availed ourselves of the rule's provisions.

I recall not many months ago when the 85th Congress had before it the so-called Great Lakes diversion bill. The bill was considered during the closing days of the 2d session of the 85th Congress, and debate was hot and heavy. Many Senators who today demand the repeal or amendment of rule XXII were opposed to the bill. They knew that the hour was getting late, that many Senators and all the Members of the House were anxious to adjourn the Congress and begin the arduous tasks of campaigning for reelection. Tempers were short, bodies were tired.

In my judgment, if a vote had been reached on the Great Lakes diversion bill, it would have passed by a considerable number of votes. In other words, a majority favored the measure.

Yet, a minority of Senators, opposed to the bill, blocked Senate action on the measure by threatening a filibuster.

Senators might recall the following exchange, which took place during the early morning hours of last August 24:

Mr. PROXMIRE. * * * I deeply appreciate the position taken by the Senator from Illinois. I do not blame him one bit. However, I mean what I say—and I never meant anything more sincerely—when I say we have a big case to make tonight. I mean we have a big case to make. I have 756 pages of the RECORD to read, much of which still has to be read. Several pages of the RECORD have been read.

I have the floor now and I am ready to read. I want all Senators to know, if they wish to stay and listen, there is a lot of good information to be presented. If Senators do not wish to stay, if they come back tomorrow night at this time, I will still be here reading (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 104, pt. XV, p. 19539).

Of course, Mr. President, the junior Senator from Wisconsin subsequently stated in all seriousness, that he was not engaging in a filibuster, that he merely wanted an opportunity to lay the facts before the Senate. In this connection, it is interesting to note a few paragraphs of the brief filed by Senators in favor of changing Senate rules to the Vice President earlier this year—a brief, incidentally, of which I assume the junior Senator from Wisconsin approved.

Rule XII is not a procedural means of getting business done; it is a substantive means of preventing business from being done. * * * It is a means of keeping the majority of the Senate and of the people from determining vital substantive issues.

I do not believe the above discussion requires any elaboration—it makes the point I wish to emphasize by the very nature of its own terms.

I want to make it abundantly clear, Mr. President, that I have no quarrel with those who utilize the provisions of the Senate rules in the manner in which they think best for their people, their State, and their Nation. That is not only their right, it is their solemn duty. I do, however, take issue with an argument or proposition whose premises shift and waver, almost from day to day, depending upon "whose ox is being gored," so to speak.

I also want to state that rule XXII is capable of being used to block action on legislation which, on a given occasion, might have received the votes of a majority of this body. As a matter of fact, I believe it is obvious that the junior Senator from Wisconsin used the provisions of rule XXII for just that purpose last year, and I commend him for it. He was convinced he was right, that the bill concerned would have injured his constituency, and he acted accordingly.

I do object, however, to those who have on past occasions used the protection accorded minorities by rule XXII, to protect their own rights, now seeking to amend rule XXII in order to deny Senators from one geographic area that same right. As a matter of fact, I have halfway been expecting a resolution to be offered, amending the Senate rules to guarantee unlimited debate except where so-called civil rights legislation might be concerned, with the stipulation, in that case, that a bare majority could end debate at any time. Frankly, I would commend those who demand a change in Senate rules for such an approach—at least, their resolution would then be in accord with their real objectives.

The Senate should also consider another argument advanced by those who demand a change in rules, namely, that the existence of rule XXII, as now constituted, paralyzes the Senate in the conduct of its business. "Paralysis," of course, Mr. President, is a relative term. It is attractive and perhaps a bit seductive to those who are are not familiar with the facts. However, in my opinion, about the only fair way we have of judging the future is to examine it in the light of the past.

The first Senate met in 1789. At that time, it adopted rules of procedure which, for all practical purposes, made the invocation of cloture, or a limitation on debate, the rule rather than the exception. At that time, the so-called previous question rule was in effect, which had the practical effect of choking off debate immediately.

In 1806, the Senate completely revised its rules, and eliminated the previous question entirely. From 1806 until 1917, when the rules were again amended, it was impossible to shut off debate in the Senate by moving the previous question, and the rules contained no overall provision for cloture. In this regard, it is interesting to note that during the period 1789 to 1806, the period when the previous question rule was in effect, it had been used only three times.

In addition, Mr. President, during the period 1806 to 1917, the Senate operated without any limitation on debate whatsoever, save for that which could be invoked by unanimous consent.

As a matter of fact, there was no provision for limiting Senate debate during the entire course of the War Between the States, although proposals to achieve that purpose were numerous. Certainly, the Union stood in grave peril during those days—certainly, unlimited or prolonged debate—even filibustering—could have worked great injury upon the Union war effort. Yet, the work of the Senate was not paralyzed, despite the lack of any limitation on debate at all. This, of itself, renders rather ridiculous the arguments of proponents of majority rule cloture, to the effect that the present two-thirds rule paralyzes the work of the Senate.

During the period 1917 to 1949, cloture was obtainable by two-thirds of the Senators present and voting, assuming the presence of a quorum, subject to the general exception that cloture could not be invoked on a motion to take up, it having been concluded by the Senate that a motion was not a measure within the purview of rule XII.

In 1949, Mr. President, agitation for an easy cloture rule came to a head. Then, as now, the right of unlimited debate in the Senate had been attacked by the proponents of so-called civil rights legislation. Then, as now, a general rules change was demanded in order to obtain action on specific legislation, namely, force bills.

In 1949, the Senate rules were changed. The amended rule XII provided that cloture could be invoked only by two-thirds of all Senators duly elected—and, in return for this concession, cloture was made applicable to a motion to take up, with the further exception that there could be no limitation of debate on a motion to take up a change in Senate rules, or a measure which would amend or add any Senate rule.

The history of efforts to limit debate in the Senate, Mr. President, amply buttress my proposition that although a quick and easy method of limiting debate is demanded by proponents of the pending resolution under the guise of general "majority rule" principles, their real and avowed objective is special legislation—so-called civil rights legislation, directed at the South.

In addition, as I have indicated earlier, I fear that their zeal has clouded their judgment, and that they today find themselves in the position of attempting to dispose of their birthright for a mess of pottage.

Freedom of debate has served a useful purpose in the past, as I intend to demonstrate in a few moments. It has not, as some would have us believe, either injured the national welfare or paralyzed the work of the Senate. It has, I might add, blocked action on measures which, if enacted, would have led to the downfall, if not outright destruction, of our free way of life.

During the 22 years I have served in the Senate, I have observed several legislative proposals either defeated or delayed by unlimited debate. In all cases, if these bills had been enacted in the fever of enthusiasm with which they were initially greeted, they would have made possible the complete destruction of our way of life.

Today, I will mention and partially discuss only three of these.

The first is the so-called Federal fair employment practices legislation which, would have dictated to an employer whom he could hire and fire.

The second was the 1946 Full Employment Act, which, prior to amendment on the Senate floor, would have permitted government competition with private enterprise in almost any field of endeavor, under the guise of maintaining full employment.

The third was a proposed amendment to the minimum wage law which sought to vest broad and sweeping authority in a network of bureaucratic boards—authority to fix minimum wages, without any effective ceiling, and without the consent of the employer, in nearly every area of national production. In other words, the proposal would have gone far beyond the Federal Government placing a floor under wages, and would have permitted Uncle Sam, in effect, to fix wages.

All three of these proposals were either defeated or modified as a result of the guaranty of unlimited debate.

The logical question now arises: "Was the defeat of these items of legislation wise and prudent—did, in fact, the guaranty of unlimited debate achieve a meritorious purpose?"

The answer must be found in the terms of the bills themselves, but before I discuss these bills, I would remind Senators that their enactment would have spelled the death knell of a free economy by:

First. Sanctioning government-owned competition with private enterprise in any field whatsoever.

Second. Permitting the Federal Government to dictate minimum wage levels for each and every class of workers engaged in commerce, with no effective ceiling on such levels.

Third. Dictating to private enterprise whom it could hire and fire.

Now, let us look at the original Full Employment Act of 1946.

This measure was introduced on January 22, 1945, by Senators Murray, Wagner, Thomas, and O'Mahoney, and given the bill number of S. 380. It was the outgrowth of some serious thinking that had been done during World War II, prompted by experiences acquired during the great depression of 1929–40.

Briefly, the measure sought to assure continuing full employment in a free competitive economy, through the concentrated efforts of industry, agriculture, labor, State and local governments, and the Federal Government.

In title, as in other ways, this was a laudable proposal. The Congress sought to lay down a policy which, if implemented carefully and in accordance with law, would make impossible a repetition of the breadlines, soup kitchens, and doles of the late depression.

One portion of the original S. 380, as it came to the floor of the Senate, provided as follows:

> To the extent that continuing full employment cannot otherwise be assured (the Federal Government), shall provide such volume of Federal investment and expenditure as may be needed, in addition to the investment and expenditure by private enterprises, consumers, and State and local governments, to assure continuing full employment.

Those were high-sounding and purposeful words, Mr. President. But they were deceptive words, also, because as Members of the Senate pointed out at that time, they carried the seed of that evil weed, socialism.

Senators will note that the language called for unrestricted Federal expenditures.

Presumably, debate on the floor of the Senate later showed, the proponents had public works subsidies or similar projects in mind. But, Mr. President, the provision of the bill did not limit such investment and expenditure to public works. It did not limit that investment and expenditure at all. Presumably, the Federal Government could have created jobs in any manner it pleased—even by going into competition with private industry.

The Federal Government, faced with the prospect of a business depression, would not have been required to limit its relief endeavors to the payment of subsidies and the creation of additional jobs through the construction of public works. Indeed not. Instead, some of the now-famous Washington planners would have suggested that the Government go into the steel business, or the automobile business, or the clothing business. It would have been possible for the Government to build plants to compete directly with private industry.

Then, of course, there is FEPC.

Now, Mr. President, I do not believe I must go into detail concerning the so-called FEPC bills. They are purely and simply social legislation attempting to inject the long arm of Uncle Sam into areas which are, and should remain, closed to Federal intervention.

However, they carry attractive overtones in that they are purportedly designed to make it illegal for an employer to deny employment to any qualified person on the basis of race, religion, or national origin.

Mr. President, although FEPC legislation seems to appear in each and every Congress, none thus far has been enacted and, if I have my way, none ever will be. As a matter of fact, the closest the Congress ever came to enacting FEPC legislation was back in 1950, when the House passed H.R. 4453, sponsored by Representative ADAM CLAYTON POWELL, of New York, who has never been particularly concerned about the practical effect of such legislation, but who seems intent upon maintaining his undisputed position as No. 1 spokesman of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People—an organization, incidentally, which cannot be accused of being either reasonable or thoughtful.

At any rate, even the passage by the House of the Powell bill did not amount to much, since as reported from the House committee it involved only fact-finding functions. There was no enforcement authority provided.

Be that as it may, Mr. President, the fact remains that the sole reason such legislation has not been enacted into law long before this is because proponents know that those of us who strenuously oppose FEPC and similar force legislation have available to us the means of rallying public opinion, namely, unlimited debate.

Thank God that we do, Mr. President, for enactment of FEPC legislation would not only mutilate what remains of good feeling among the white and Negro races in the South, but it would also be another nail driven into the coffin sought to be prepared by those who desire a socialized America. In this connection, I would like to quote briefly from the draft of a minority report prepared by my distinguished colleague from Alabama [Mr. HILL] on S. 1728, a Senate FEPC bill, introduced during the 81st Congress:

> Under our Constitution it has never been seriously questioned that a man has the right to set himself up in business, to select his own employees on the basis of such qualifications as he might within his own free and uncontrolled discretion consider advantageous to the undertaking, and to do all this without hindrance or interference. This personal freedom of contract is basic to the free-enterprise system and to the whole American concept of individual freedom.
> The far-reaching character of this provision of S. 1728 is given its true perspective when we consider that laws have been enacted governing the form or substance of contracts voluntarily entered into; that laws make illegal certain types of contracts; that the labor laws require collective bargaining as a method of arriving at contracts and affect the scope of contracts. But the right of contract is left free to be exercised between voluntary parties.
> Our history of encouragement to the men and women who give employment has been one of the compelling reasons for our unparalleled industrial success which again and again has served our Nation so well in time of need.
> But under the bill every act of the employer or any of his subordinates in hiring, discharging, promoting, or otherwise regulating conditions of employment is subject to complaint and investigation on the grounds of discrimination.
> The employer is subject to a Commission having wide powers of rulemaking investigation, and the issuance of cease-and-desist orders. But the right of trial by jury is denied and judicial review is provided with a clearly recognized inferential power to punish contempt of court orders.
> The inquiries and investigations directed by the act would vex and harass business to the point where orderly plant management and efficient production would be impossible. The small businessman, already overburdened, would encounter new regulations, investigations, hearings, and litigation far beyond his time, his energy, or his finances.
> Labor organizations would be subject to interference and supervision of their internal affairs. And the law which tells the employer who his workers shall be today, can be reversed and the worker told who his employer shall be tomorrow—and where and at what wages.

I turn now to the third item I mentioned previously, Mr. President, that is, the bill which would have given authority to a group of bureaucrats to, in effect, fix wages throughout the country.

Senators may recall that on August 1, 1945, S. 1349 was introduced in the Senate, amending the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938. That bill would have provided for a minimum wage of 65 cents per hour during the first year of operation, 70 cents per hour during the second year, and 75 cents per hour thereafter, with the added proviso that the 65–70-or 75-cent-per-hour rate in effect at a given time was to be regarded as a base or peg-point for unskilled laborers. As to others, the Wage and Hour Administrator would have been authorized to convene industry committees empowered to define "reasonable job classifications and recommend rates to maintain wage differentials between the minimum for unskilled workers and those for interrelated job classifications."

In other words, Mr. President, S. 1349, as introduced, would have made 75 cents an hour a minimum wage for unskilled workers some 2 years after its approval, with power in the Administrator and his handpicked industry boards to fix higher mimimum wages for semiskilled or skilled workers, based upon the 75 cents per hour minimum for unskilled workers. There was no ceiling in the bill as to what the maximum minimum wage might be.

Fortunately, Mr. President, the Senate Committee on Education and Labor, on which I was privileged to be a member, struck this authority from the bill before reporting it to the Senate. As part 2 of Senate Report 1012 of the 79th Congress, second session, notes:

> The committee * * * (2) deleted all reference to the setting of minimum wages for semiskilled and skilled occupations above the proposed minimum.

Frankly, Mr. President, I happen to know that the reason this authority was deleted by the committee, before the bill was reported, resulted from the determination on the part of many Senators to discuss the bill in detail and at considerable length should it ever come to the Senate floor in the same form as it was introduced. The committee, realizing that discretion was the better part of valor, deleted the wage-fixing authority which S. 1349 contained, before reporting it to the Senate for action.

Here, again, Mr. President, we have an example of how the right of unlimited debate has saved our people from the theft of their liberties under the guise of so-called majority rule. In my judgment, a majority of the Senate probably favored the shotgun authority S. 1349 would have given to the Administrator of Wages and Hours.

Mr. President, I have cited three instances which illustrate how the right of unlimited debate has assisted in preserving the basic free enterprise system of our Nation. I believe these three specific examples, taken at random, completely rebut the pious pronouncements of those who would substitute so-called majority rule for sane and sober deliberation in the Senate.

Let me repeat, Mr. President. Had the three bills which I have listed have been enacted into law—the first one fixing wages without the consent of employers; the second forcing employers to hire workers not of their choice; and the third providing the Federal Government with authority to give employment to everyone and compete with private enterprise—in my judgment, they would have destroyed private enterprise. We could have hung crepe on the door of private enterprise if those three pieces of proposed legislation had been enacted. The threat of filibuster and filibuster prevented their enactment into law.

If we need any other evidence to demonstrate the fallacy inherent in the plea of rules-change proponents today, we can find it in the words of Alexis de Tocqueville, a brilliant young French political scientist who warned, after visiting America in 1831, of the folly of so-called majority rule. I quote from volume I, "Democracy in America," by De Tocqueville:

> In my opinion, the main evil of the present democratic institutions of the United States does not arise, as is often asserted in Europe, from their weakness, but from their irresistible strength. I am not so much alarmed at the excessive liberty which reigns in that country, as at the inadequate securities which one finds there against tyranny.
> When an individual or a party is wronged in the United States, to whom can he apply for redress? If to public opinion, public opinion constitutes the majority; if to the legislature, it represents the majority, and implicitly obeys it; if to the executive power, it is appointed by the majority, and serves as a passive tool in its hands. The public force consists of the majority under arms; the jury is the majority invested with the right of hearing judicial cases; and in certain States, even the judges are elected by the majority. However iniquitous or absurd the measure of which you complain, you must submit to it as well as you can.
> If, on the other hand, a legislative power could be so constituted as to represent the majority without necessarily being the slave of its passions, an executive so as to retain a proper share of authority, and a judiciary so as to remain independent of the other two powers, a government would be formed which would still be democratic, without incurring hardly any risk of tyranny.

Mr. President, these words were written in the mid-1830's. Though over a century and a quarter old, they are good advice today. I urge Senators to heed them, and to retain the United States Senate as the great bastion of freedom which it is today—a rock against which the tides of mutable majorities may wash, but one which they will never destroy.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I have prepared a statement of my views with regard to the resolution now pendinb before the Senate, which I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR MCCARTHY

We are quick to say in the United States that ours is a government of laws and not of men. Fundamentally this is true. There are many areas of decision and of action in which law has not been brought clearly to bear. In some instances it is because of the difficulty of applying the law; in others it is because reasonable men have through the years come to common agreement without any legal formalization of procedure or practice. We must, therefore, have a respect for custom and for practice and for the good example which has been given to us by political leaders of this country in the past. Procedure is important in democratic government. Custom is important. Traditional practice is important.

Procedure, however, is a means and not an end. It is vital to democracy that our principal concern be with substance and not with form, and that procedure be made subordinate to substantive legislative action. I, of course, share with other Members of the Senate a respect for the traditions of this great body—for its rules and for its customary forms of action.

I have joined with men of long experience in the U.S. Senate in an effort to amend the rules of the U.S. Senate. I do this with the conviction that we are acting within what I consider to be the clear intent of the men who drafted the Constitution; namely, that each Congress should establish its own rules for procedure—rules to be formulated and administered so that the will of the majority, a simple majority of the Members of the U.S. Senate, can be made effective in legislative action in all areas excepting those in which the Constitution has clearly called for more than a simple majority.

In my opinion, the case for changing rule XXII transcends the question of liberal versus conservative interest and also that of regional interest. It is a fact, of course, that the consideration of civil rights legislation is in a large measure responsible for the immediate attention being given to change in the rules of the Senate, but this is an accident to the whole question. The decision which we are to make is one which should be based upon the basic general principle of democracy. It was clearly intended by the framers of the Constitution that decisions of a simple majority of the representatives of the people and of the States, both the House and the Senate, should prevail. The exceptions were reserved to certain explicit crucial decisions: The approval of treaties (in which the ordinary veto of the House of Representatives is not operative), overriding the veto of the Chief Executive, proposals to amend the Constitution, impeachment proceedings, and expulsion of Members. It is my opinion that the Senate cannot under the Constitution adopt rules which either directly or indirectly prevent a simple majority of its numbers from passing on matters, excepting in those cases where the Constitution itself requires more than a simple majority.

Actually, the standing rules nowhere state that decisions will be made by majority rule; even rule XII, which is concerned with voting, does not mention that percentage shall constitute approval. The term "majority" is mentioned four times (rule XIII, sec. 1; rule XXIV, sec. 1; rule XXXVII, sec. 1; rule XXXVIII, sec. 2) but these are for specific occasions where there might be doubt. Otherwise the standing rules simply take for granted the general parliamentary practice of majority decision. There is nothing to indicate that the two-thirds vote to change the rules is in any way justified. The standing rules call for a two-thirds vote on only three occasions: (1) A provision for "special orders," which is really a call for exceptions from the existing rules (rule X, sec. 1); (2) clarification for votes on matters involving treaties, where the constitutional restriction of two-thirds is already called for (rule XXXVII, sec. 1); (3) and rule XXII. It is this potentially unlimited use of rule XXII to turn any bill into a two-thirds approval which we are seeking to eliminate as inconsistent with the tradition of general majority rule.

Rule XXII as now constituted has the effect of extending these special provisions to all proposed legislation. Perhaps we should determine that other areas besides those specified in the Constitution should be elevated to the status of crucial issues reserved for extraordinary approval. A number of such areas were considered in the Constitutional Convention and rejected. However, if this is to be done, it should be done through the regular constitutional channels.

It is proper and necessary that the Senate rules guarantee full and extended debate on every bill. The Douglas proposal, in my opinion, provides this safeguard. As a matter of fact, in its requirement of a 15-day waiting period after the filing of a petition, before the final cloture vote can be taken, the Douglas proposal insures the opportunity for open discussion. But unlike the existing rule, it insures that the majority ultimately will determine whether a vote shall be taken or shall not be taken.

A very special kind of argument can be made against permitting the filibuster on the question of whether or not the bill should be taken up or should not be taken up. Such prolonged debate, or filibuster, which prevents free and open debate on specific legislation limits the Senate as a forum of public debate. It is the debate on the subtleties of the law, its background, its precedents, its possibilities for good as well as the dangers inherent in the proposed legislation, that make the Senate unique as a deliberative body. Such debate can take place satisfactorily only if a specific law or proposal of law is before the Senate.

The question of whether the Senate is a continuing body or not is one which is of some importance, but it is not the principal basis for determination for the issue now before the Senate. Whether continuing or not, the constitutional authority, article I, section 5: "Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings" is the decisive guide. The Constitution cannot be changed by a majority of this Senate.

In a continuing body, there must be some orderly means for changing its rules along the way. Otherwise a body would be committed to abide by the rules which were set up when it was first established. The only guide here is that of reason and good order, and the practical decision is logical that rules should be changed, if desired, at the beginning of each new Congress. Otherwise, we are faced with the unanswerable question of what constitutes a change of membership in a continuous body. Is it when one-third, or two-thirds, or all the members are in fact different from those who last adopted new rules? Or when one-third, two-thirds, or all have either been newly elected or have passed through the purifying process of reelection? Or should we propose that a majority of each of the three classes of Senators—the 2-year, the 4-year, and the 6-year Members—be necessary in order to change the rules? When these and similar alternatives are considered, it seems reasonable and obvious that the beginning of each new Congress is the logical time for changing rules. This is the practice in the House of Representatives and it is consistent with the constitutional directive and rulings of Mr. Barkley and Mr. NIXON speaking in their constitutionally established office of presiding officers of the Senate.

There is a final argument made in favor of the continuation of the two-thirds rule for cloture; namely, that minorities need the protection that is afforded when one-third of the Senate can prevent consideration or a vote on legislation which 66 percent may support.

Of course there are risks in majority rule, but it has generally been accepted that the risks of minority rule are even greater. The opposite argument arises from the question of whether or not a minority is to be permitted to frustrate the will of the majority. The Senate, of course, was designed to give some protection to minorities. For this reason two Senators were provided in the Constitution for each State in the Union no matter what the population of the respective States might be. The Senate is an important, but not an exclusive protector of minority rights. This is not a unicameral government. It is not one in which the rights of people rest wholly in the determinations of a single legislative body. Our Government was designed to establish a system of checks and balances. There is the vote of the House of Representatives; the veto power of the President; and the review power of the courts to be considered.

The adoption of the rule proposed by Senator DOUGLAS would not deprive minorities of any rights guaranteed them by the Constitution of the United States. It will not interfere with the traditional and constitutional system of checks and balance built into the U.S. Government and it will not destroy or weaken the Senate as the great forum of public debate.

The only risks involved in the adoption of this rule are the fundamental risks which are involved in the whole operation and practice of democratic government. This is not a time to be fearful of majority rule when all around the world we are speaking of our respect for human persons; of our dedication to democracy; of our belief in the rights of reasonable people to determine their own laws and their own system of government. To say that all of this is good advice for others but insofar as our own Government is concerned, that we have grave doubts as to whether the majority can be trusted is not very encouraging to our troubled friends in other nations. At the time that we are recommending change to other people are we to accept the position that change is a dangerous thing for us? Are we going to oppose change by the indirect method of permitting the filibuster to slow down, if not to prevent, necessary adjustments and modifications of our own laws?

This is the fundamental question and this is the test to which the Senate of the United States is being put in the consideration of this rule change.

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, I am opposed to Senate Resolution 5, and any other motion or resolution which tends in any manner or degree to restrict or curtail the full and complete freedom of debate and discussion in the United States Senate. To me, unlimited debate is just as much a fundamental right of a Senator as is the injunction of the first amendment to the Constitution: "Congress shall make no law abridging the freedom of speech" to all the people.

From the days of the Greek City States in the dawn of Western civilization, full, free, and open debate has been the hallmark of free people in organized society. History teaches that the decay of all free governments has first been characterized by strictures on the freedom of debate and discussion.

Senate Resolution 5, in its content, is mild in comparison to other measures that have been proposed for the purpose of curtailing debate. But all of them are designed to the same end, and whether the result is achieved by a sudden flood or gradual erosion is immaterial in the light of the great principle involved.

The Government of the United States is dissimilar from any other political institution which has ever been erected by an organized society. Its genius and its glory lies in the fact that it was a brilliantly conceived compact between sovereign powers whereby a central government was granted certain specific, delegated, and enumerated powers. Before that government could be established, these conditions had to be written into the charter:

The enumeration in the Constitution, of certain rights, shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

The U.S. Senate, in its most fundamental nature, was designed both as the forum and the guardian of the States in the scheme of the central government. Basic in both the theory and practice of the Senate was full, free, and unlimited debate. How can the representatives of sovereign States be limited or curtailed in their representation without doing violence to both the language and intent of the Constitution?

This proposition was so elemental that from 1789 until 1917—128 years—it was accepted without question. I am sure that Senator Hardwick was speaking for the overwhelming majority of the Senate when he explained his position as to the adoption of a cloture rule in 1917. He said:

I support this rule reluctantly. I would not yield even this far except, Mr. President, that I do feel that on questions that affect our country's international affairs when war is imminent, is threatened, or is actually occurring, there must be some way in which the will of an overwhelming majority, a majority so large as to show that the interests of the country and not that of a party are at stake, can be asserted.

History has demonstrated that Senator Hardwick's fears were groundless. Neither in the course of World War I, nor during World War II nor the Korean war, was it ever necessary for this Senate to invoke, or attempt to invoke, cloture on any measure even remotely connected with the war effort. As long as our country remains the constitutional republic designed by the basic charter we will always be able to meet any emergency and contingency, and any threat of harm or danger from without. The danger which confronts us today is internal. There are those among us who would completely transform the meaning and intent of the Constitution without any definitive act on the part of the people by way of amendment. They would press the several States into a solid and indistinguishable mass, completely controlled and dominated by the Central Government.

To achieve this end, absolute rule by a bare majority must be established in the U.S. Senate. While Senate Resolution 5 does not go all the way, it is a giant step down the road to a so-called majority rule.

The compromise which made possible the formation of the United States was based on a formula which would protect States that were small in area and population against those which were large in both area and population. This protection was made possible through the design of the U.S. Senate, where each State, regardless of size or population, would always have equal representation. The "always" is an absolute finality. The only section of the Constitution that cannot be amended by the people is the portion of article V which provides "that no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate."

In the House of Representatives, where the Members are elected on the basis of population, the ratio ranges from one Member representing a population of 128,643, to 43 Members from one State representing a population of 14,830,192—1950 census.

Our party political conventions have their delegates based on the representation of the House. These conventions dominate the election of the President. Here, the majority of delegates, represented by the large States, has a tremendous influence while the small have almost none. The Constitution did not anticipate this dominance of the party system in the selection of the chief executive officer of the United States. As a matter of fact, it was designed to prevent the operation of the parties in the selection of a President. What happens when a presidential candidate does not receive a majority of the votes cast in the electoral college? The election is thrown into the House of Representatives. Then there becomes an absolute equality on the part of the States. Forty-nine, one for each State, is the maximum vote. One Representative from Alaska is equal to the 43 combined votes from the State of New York. There are many who may be opposed to this provision of the Constitution providing how a President shall be elected, but until such time as the Constitution is changed by proper amendment, this is the manner so provided.

By the same token, this United States Senate was designed as a court and forum for the sovereign States and not for any population ratios, majorities or groups composing the population of the United States. The State of Vermont is equal to the great States of New York and California. The small States, individually or aggregately, cannot be imposed upon and trampled upon when unlimited debate and discussion is the practice and rule in the United States Senate.

The majority protects itself. There is no such thing in the American system of government, in a constitutional democracy, as rooted injustice—that a majority is always right because it is a majority. Every government which protects free men must guarantee certain basic rights—rights without which no man can be a free man. Each has freedom of speech, association, freedom to worship, freedom of the press, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. Unlimited debate in the U.S. Senate is the shield and safeguard to these fundamental rights and privileges.

Jefferson, in the Declaration of Independence, proclaimed the doctrine that every man has certain inalienable rights. He meant rights which no government could take away from the individual citizen. Free debate safeguards these rights. Without free debate, they would be nationalized.

Freedom of debate in the Senate was endorsed by Woodrow Wilson, Thomas Jefferson, Abraham Lincoln, James Buchanan, Henry Clay, and practically all the great leaders in Congress.

In a speech made by the Senator from Illinois on May 9, 1957, to justify cloture on debate in the Senate by a majority, reference is made to an alleged precedent in the House of Commons which was the basis for the adoption of the previous question in that great parliamentary body. This is the language he used to describe the situation then existing in the House of Commons and the necessity for cloture:

> It will be recalled that the Irish leader, Isaac Butt, died in 1879 and Charles Stewart Parnell took over the leadership of the home-rule movement. As the eminent Oxford historian, Keith Feiling, put it, Parnell "set at work on two fronts: at Westminister, to make Parliament unbearable by obstruction until Ireland's claims were heard, and to bid one British party up against the other"—Keith Feiling, "A History of England," London, Macmillan, 1950, page 978.
> So it happened that the question of how to deal with obstructive debate came inescapable before the British House of Commons soon after the speaker made his 1877 ruling.
> The next move was the adoption of a standing order in 1880, under which any Member who was cited by the speaker for willfully obstructing debate was suspended. Several members were suspended, but the obstruction increased.

For my colleagues of Irish descent in this Senate, and for all people everywhere who believe in freedom, liberty, justice and law, listen to me now. There was a great famine in Ireland in the year 1879. English landlords could not collect the rents and evictions were wholesale. Charles Parnell founded the Irish National Land League, an organization designed to obtain a fair rent, a rent that the tenant can reasonably pay according to the times. The league was bent on preventing delinquent tenants from being dispossessed. As a consequence, friction, tension, and animosity developed between the English landlords and Irish tenants.

Parnell visited the United States in 1880 to raise a relief fund for the tenants and for promotion work of the Irish National Land League. When he returned to England and continued his speaking tour in Ireland, he was arrested and indicted for seditious conspiracy. The trial opened in Dublin, January 5, 1881, and lasted for 20 days. It was obvious to the Government that no conviction could be obtained.

Because of the famine, the inability of tenants to pay rents, the refusal of tenants under some circumstances to be evicted from the land, it was necessary for the Government in England to devise some means to cope with this situation for the benefit of the English landlords. The last thing the Government was concerned about was the welfare of the people of Ireland.

To solve the Irish question, the Government introduced in the House of Commons a coercion bill. Two of the most hideous features of this bill provided, first, arrests could be made on mere suspicion and the suspect incarcerated in jail without trial for a long period of time; second, denial of the right of habeas corpus to imprisoned tenants.

Parnell returned to his seat in Parliament, and on the day the coercion bill was presented to the House, arose on the floor and introduced an amendment providing "that peace and tranquillity cannot be promoted in Ireland by suspending any of the constitutional rights of the Irish people."

There were 41 Members of the British Parliament from Ireland who participated in the caucus that elected Mr. Parnell their leader. Their names were John Barry, J. G. Biggar, Garret M. Byrne, Dr. Andrew Cummins, W. J. Corbett, John Daly, Charles Dawson, James L. Finigan, H. J. Gill, Richard Lalor, Edmund Leamy, James Leahy, M. M. Marum, J. C. McCoan, Justin McCarthy, T. P. O'Connor, Arthur O'Connor, The O'Gorman Mahon, James O'Kelly, W. H. O'Shea, W. H. O'Sullivan, Thomas Sexton, T. D. Sullivan, John A. Blake, Maurice Brooks, Philip Callan, Col. David Colthurst, George Errington, J. W. Foley, Charles J. Fay, Daniel F. Gabbett, E. D. Gray, D. H. McFarland, Sir J. N. McKenna, Patrick Martin, Charles H. Meldon, Sir P. O'Brien, Richard Power, P. J. Smyth, John Smithwick, and E. J. Synan.

Do any Senators present recognize the names of your family and relations in this group?

Approximately 20 of the home rulers were present in Parliament to participate with Mr. Parnell when he attempted to educate the English Parliament on the implications of the coercion bill. What happened is graphically described in the words of one of the Irish Members, Justin McCarthy:

> We were then about 20 strong, all told; and the House of Commons contains some 650 members. With the exception of some half a dozen stout English radicals who were always on our side, the whole house was against us. Every man's hand was against us, but I am bound to admit that our hand was against every man. We made a great many speeches in those days. The House of Commons did not always listen to us, but we made our speeches all the same. We kept the house sitting through long and weary nights; we kept the house sitting once from 4 o'clock on the Monday afternoon until 6 o'clock on the following Wednesday evening, no intermission of debate all that time. We went in for open and avowed obstruction; we declared that, so long as we could, we would resist the coercion bill. Then they tried to amend their procedure, and made all sort of new rules to introduce a closure, meant, of course, only for the Irish members—I mean those who called themselves emphatically the Irish members. Once or twice the speaker accomplished a very coup d'etat, and brought a long debate to a sudden close. We were each of us suspended from the service of the house. We were all of us expelled from the house in a body on one memorable evening; each of us refusing to leave the house until the sergeant-at-arms had gone through the formula of using force to carry out the mandate of the majority. Of course we came back again the next day, or on whatever day the sentence of suspension expired; and we went on with our work of obstruction as if nothing had happened. We were doing just what we wanted to do; we were arousing the attention of England and Scotland and the civilized world. Our cause was gaining every day in Ireland, and among the Irish in America and Australia.

Mr. President, here is the genesis of the previous question in the British House of Commons. Is there a person in the sound of my voice who would not hang his head in shame if he had been a party to this not only coercive but actually illegal and unconstitutional action against the fundamental rights and liberties of the Irish people? Yet the proponents of cloture stand in this body and cite this horrible example as a reason why the Senate of the United States is warranted and justified in moving the previous question and cutting off debate without a change in the rules of the Senate in accordance with the procedures therein provided.

What happened in this U.S. Senate and Congress when there existed in this country a situation similar to that which confronted the famine-ridden Irish people in the year 1879? Who can forget the desperate plight of our own agricultural population in the depth of the depression when mortgage foreclosures and evictions were wholesale? Under the then existing economic conditions it was utterly impossible for the average tenant or landowner to retain the right to possess his land. This Senate and Congress did not pass a coercion bill such as that adopted by the House of Commons. We did not permit the arrest of recalcitrant landowners and tenants on suspicion and suspend the writ of habeas corpus. This Congress passed the Farm Bankruptcy Act to give relief, aid, and succor to the oppressed and frustrated farmers. It was unnecessary to have cloture or the previous question in the U.S. Senate to achieve the desired relief. How can any individual or group in the name of justice, liberty, and freedom advance an argument that a policy adopted by the House of Commons in England to destroy the obstructionism of the Irish members of the British House of Commons to stand as a valid precedent for this United States Senate to adopt a gag rule? A gag rule in the United States will just as certainly destroy the fundamental rights, liberties, and freedom of the people of the United States as did its adoption in the House of Commons destroy those of the Irish.

Mr. President, the course of action that should be followed in this Senate is not only to defeat Senate Resolution 5, or any other proposal to further curtail and limit debate, but the Senate should go further and delete completely both sections 2 and 3 of rule XXII and restore in this Senate the rule of free and unlimited debate that existed from 1789 to 1917.

Mr. President, on April 6, 1789, the Senate was first organized. From that day, almost 169 years ago, to this moment, it has in law and in fact been a continuing body. The presently belatedly advanced and novel theory and argument that such is not so is fundamentally contrary to the purposes of the Founding Fathers of this Republic; it is advanced against the expressed provisions of the Constitution itself; it denies and repudiates the precedents of this body that are both uniform and conclusive; it repeals and reverses decisions of our highest courts which have sustained this constitutional fact and the precedents and rules of the Senate.

In previous times, when the rules of this body have been subjected to heated discussions, it has been so accepted as a fundamental truth by both sides to the argument that mention of the continuing character of the Senate has received comment only as an incidental aspect of the debate. In this incidental relation, no statement has impressed me more than one made by our late and beloved colleague, Senator George, in the debate on the Wherry resolution in 1949. He said:

> In my judgment the ordinary rules of parliamentary procedure do not and should not apply in the Senate of the United States. I know that the Senate is a legislative body in part. I know that it must handle legislative matters which come from the House, or which originate here and go to the House. But the Senate is a distinct institution within itself, a continuing body, only one-third of the membership of the Senate being elected every 2 years. It is not a body which expires. Its primary function is not legislation in the strict sense. Its primary and main function, indeed, in certain important matters, partakes of the nature of conference and negotiation between sovereignties.
> Be it remembered, Mr. President, that the Federal Government did not create the States. On the contrary, the States created the Federal Government. They gave it all the power it has, except such power as has subsequently been given by the people under amendments to the Constitution, or certain powers which perhaps have resulted, let us say, from unavoidable decisions of the courts of the land.
> Not only is the Senate a continuing body, but under the Constitution the Senate is to be composed of an equal number of Senators—two—from each State, wholly without regard to the population of the State, wholly without regard to the ratio of the population of the State to the total population of all the States. Not only is that so, but under the Constitution no State can be deprived of its equal representation in the Senate, save by its own consent—not by a two-thirds vote, not by the majority that is always infallible, in the judgment of many of our good friends here; but no State can be deprived of equal representation in the Senate, save by its own consent. In other words, the Constitution cannot even be amended—short of a revolution—in regard to that provision which gives to the Senate a distinct character.

Mr. President, make no mistake about it, to declare the Senate not a continuing body, even for the purpose of adopting rules, will in fact effect the revolution that Senator George describes and at the same time fundamentally change the character of the Government of the United States.

A former Vice President, in making his valedictory address to this body, uttered these noble and inspiring words:

> This House is a sanctuary, a citadel of law, of order, and of liberty; and it is here, in this exalted refuge, here, if anywhere, will resistance be made to the storms of political phrensy and the silent arts of corruption; and, if the Constitution be destined ever to perish by the sacrilegious hands of the demagog or the usurper, which God avert, its expiring agonies will be witnessed on this floor.

The present attempt to change the rules by destroying the fundamental character of the Senate is a bald evidence of "a storm of political phrensy" that demands the utilization of any means to effect the desired result.

This is the stated end of the proponents of the pending resolution:

> We believe it is essential for Congress to proceed promptly to the consideration and enactment of constructive legislation to assist compliance with the Supreme Court's desegregation decisions and to prevent school and church bombings and other denials of equal protection of the laws, free from the filibuster roadblock. This will be impossible unless the Senate first adopts rules that will enable it to stop unlimited debate.

These are the means that would be employed:

> Majority rule can only be restored in the Senate by an effective change in rule XXII at the opening of Congress.

To reach the objective through the proposed means, this citadel of law and order will have to be completely demolished and the Senate of the United States transformed into a prototype of the House of Representatives without benefit of a constitutional amendment.

If the Founding Fathers had intended for the Senate and the House of Representatives to be constituted and operated in identical manner and form, there would have been no purpose in establishing the Senate as a separate body with all of the distinctive characteristics provided for it by the Constitution. No purpose, no matter how worthwhile it might seem in the minds of the proponents, could justify destruction of the expressed intent and purpose of the Constitution on the grounds of expediency.

The Vice President holds office and presides over the Senate under articles I and II of the Constitution. His term as Vice President of the United States and as President of the Senate is for 4 years. His resignation as a Member of the Senate was effective at the close of business on January 1, 1953. His successor—and under the Constitution only Members of the Senate are subject to executive appointment—succeeded to his office as of January 2, 1953, thereby gaining 1 day in seniority over newly elected Members along with whom he took the oath of office on January 3, 1953. With Vice President Barkley presiding, 36 newly elected or appointed Senators took the oath of office. A complement of 60 Senators was at this time constitutionally in office carrying out the perpetuity that was established for the Senate under the Constitution. It was the constitutional plan and the Senate rules that permitted the senior Senator from California to gain this 1 day of seniority over the newly elected Senators of the class of 1953.

Mr. President, there was a constitutional Vice President to preside over the Senate on January 3, 1953. On January 20, 1953, after the Vice President took the oath of office at the inaugural ceremonies, he proceeded directly to this Chamber and assumed the chair as President of the Senate with nothing more in the way of ceremony other than the applause of the Members of the Senate. The Anderson motion was no more in order when introduced on January 3, 1953, the first day of the 83d Congress, than it would have been on January 20, 1953, when you took over the chair. This character and continuity of the Senate cannot be legally altered or changed without a change in the Constitution itself.

There would be no United States of America today had not the magic formula contained in the numerals 2, 4, and 6 been devised—two years for Members of the House of Representatives; 4 years for executive offices, and 6 years for Senators. This was the great compromise that made possible the birth of the Nation. If we nullify the meaning and application of the 6, as it has existed for 169 years, we destroy the Constitution itself.

The point of controversy in the Federal Convention to draft the United States Constitution which was the most difficult of all to resolve was the character and basis of representation in the proposed upper branch of the Congress. Whether there would be equal votes for each State in the second branch was a subject of vigorous debate for a period of 10 days. The debate became so heated and the delegates appeared to be at such loggerheads that Benjamin Franklin proposed "imploring the assistance of heaven" and opening the Convention sessions with a prayer. The issue was resolved by recognizing the absolute sovereignty and equality of States.

After the issue of equal representation of States having been provided for, the Convention then turned to how the Senators should be elected and the terms. The plan for election by State Legislatures was adopted after 3 days' debate. It is interesting to note that some delegates even proposed that a Senator hold office for life.

The final results of the deliberations in regard to the Senate resulted in these constitutional provisions:

Article I, section 3: The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof, for 6 years; and each Senator shall have one vote.

Immediately after they shall be assembled in consequence of the first election, they shall be divided as equally as may be into three classes. The seats of the Senators of the first class shall be vacated at the expiration of the second year, of the second class at the expiration of the fourth year, and of the third class at the expiration of the sixth year, so that one-third may be chosen every second year; and if vacancies happen by resignation, or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.

No better expression of the intent of the delegates to the Federal Convention, insofar as the Senate is concerned, can be found than that contained in George Mason's summation as to why he would not sign the draft of the proposed Constitution. He said:

The Senate have the power of altering all money bills, and of originating appropriations of money and the salaries of the officers of their own appointment in conjunction with the President of the United States, although they are not the representatives of the people or amenable to them. These, with their other great powers (viz, their powers in the appointment of ambassadors and all public officers, in making treaties, and in trying all impeachments;) their influence upon, and conjunction with, the supreme executive from these causes; their duration of office; and their being a constant existing body, almost continually sitting, joined with their being one complete branch of the legislature, will destroy any balance in the Government, and enable them to accomplish what usurpations they please, upon the rights and liberties of the people.

His fear that the constituency of the Senate would destroy any balance in the Government and enable the Senate to accomplish what usurpation it pleased upon the rights and liberties of the people has been groundless, but his statement that the Senate was established as a constant existing body was true then and is true today.

James Madison, in commenting on the Senate, said:

It ought, moreover, to possess great firmness, and consequently ought to hold its authority by a tenure of considerable duration. * * *

Either Madison or Hamilton, writing in "Federalist," No. 63, after discussing the defects in the biennial election of Members to the House of Representatives, said:

The proper remedy for this defect must be an additional body in the legislative department, which having sufficient permanency to provide for such objects as require a continued attention, and a train of measures, may be justly and effectually answerable for the attainment of those objects.

John Jay, writing in "The Federalist," No. 64, said of the Senate.

The duration prescribed is such as will give them an opportunity of greatly extending their political information, and of rendering their accumulating experience more and more beneficial to their country. Nor has the convention discovered less prudence, in providing for the frequent elections of Senators in such a way, as to obviate the inconvenience of periodically transferring those great affairs entirely to new men: for by leaving a considerable residue of the old ones in place, uniformity and order, as well as a constant succession of official information, will be preserved.

Alexander Hamilton, in "The Federalist," No. 59, discussing the rotation of Senators by classes, said:

The joint result of these circumstances would be that a temporary combination of a few States, to intermit the appointment of Senators, could neither annul the existence, nor impair the activity of the body; and it is not from a general and permanent combination of the States that we can have anything to fear.

Mr. President, 55 delegates participated in the drafting of the United States Constitution. Nineteen of the 55 delegates subsequently became United States Senators. Eleven of the nineteen served in the first Senate. The names and terms of the 19 are:

Abraham Baldwin, of Georgia; elected to the United States Senate in 1799; reelected in 1805, and served from March 4, 1799, until his death; elected President pro tempore of the Senate December 7, 1801, and April 17, 1802; died in Washington, D. C., March 4, 1807.

William Blount, of Tennessee; August 2, 1796, to July 8, 1797.

Oliver Ellsworth, of Connecticut; March 4, 1789, to March 8, 1796.

Nicholas Gilman, of New Hampshire; March 4, 1805, until his death on May 2, 1814.

William Samuel Johnson, of Connecticut; March 4, 1789, to March 4, 1791.

John Langdon, of New Hampshire; March 4, 1789, to March 3, 1801.

Alexander Martin, of North Carolina; March 4, 1793, to March 3, 1799.

William Paterson, of New Jersey; March 4, 1789, to March 2, 1790; November 3, 1790, to March 30, 1793.

Charles Pinckney, of South Carolina; December 4, 1798, until December 1801.

George Read, of Delaware; March 4, 1789, to September 18, 1793.

Caleb Strong, of Massachusetts; March 4, 1789, to June 1, 1796.

Mr. President, here we have a combination of the men who both drafted the Constitution and organized the original Senate of the United States on April 6, 1789. No people on earth were ever in a better position to know the meaning and intent of the Constitution, particularly insofar as the United States Senate was concerned. Many of these men participated in the promulgation of the rules which have been carried forward to this moment. To them it was crystal clear that insofar as rules were concerned, and for all other purposes, the Senate was a continuing body. Actions speak louder than words. What men do is a far more effective guide to human conduct than what men say. The operation of the Senate from Congress to Congress and from term to term of these Senators is exactly consonant with the operation of the Senate from Congress to Congress and term to term to this day. In the face of this overwhelming evidence, who are we today to stand on this floor and attempt by argument and legerdemain to change not only the concept of the Senate as a continuing body, but the meaning and intent of the Constitution itself?

The continuing character of the upper House of the United States Congress so attracted students of government and political scientists that two sovereign countries in drafting constitutions adopted the idea that was expressed in the United States Constitution for their own basic charters. Brazil first adopted a republican constitution on February 24, 1891. The charter provided for a senate composed of three members from each state and three from the federal district. The term of office for a senator was set at 9 years with one-third of the membership renewable every 3 years. The Constitution of Brazil has been changed from time to time, but with the exception of a decade between 1935 and 1946 the upper house of the Brazilian legislature has been, for all practical purposes, a continuing body based on the example of the United States. Article 89 of the constitution of 1934 provides that the senate shall be composed of two representatives from each state of the union and two from the federal district, for terms of 8 years, the membership being renewable half at a time each time there are elections for the Chamber of Deputies, that is, every 4 years. The constitution also provides that half of the senate would continue in session in the intervals when the legislature was not in session, a role in the nature of a "permanent committee," with some legislative duties and others which are spelled out.

The Constitution of Australia, effective September 17, 1900, in section 13 provides:

> As soon as may be after the senate first meets, and after each first meeting of the senate following a dissolution thereof, the senate shall divide the senators chosen for each state into two classes, as nearly equal in number as practicable; and the places of the senators of the first class shall become vacant at the expiration of (the third year) 3 years, and the places of those of the second class at the expiration of (the sixth year) 6 years, from the beginning of their term of service; and afterwards the places of senators shall become vacant at the expiration of 6 years from the beginning of their term of service.

Senator O'Connor of New South Wales, in discussing the rotation of Australian senators, points up the similarities between the Australian Constitution and that of the United States in saying:

> One section of the American Constitution provides for the renewal of the Senate. There are three classes of Senators. Six years is the whole period for which a Senator is elected. The first class retires at the end of 2 years, the next at the end of 4 years and the third at the end of 6 years. It was left perfectly open to the Senate of the United States to arrive at a division, and the method adopted was to arrange the rotation by lot. They divided the Senate into three classes, and then a representative from each class drew by lot to determine which Senators should be in the first class, which in the second, and which in the third. In several of the State constitutions in America—I think in 10 altogether—there are similar provisions for the rotation of senators. In all these cases the method is directed to be by lot. I do not know of any State constitution in America where the rotation is to be by any other method. Those precedents certainly satisfy one that there is a great deal to be said in favor of that method of arriving at a decision.

My remarks as to the constitutions of these two countries are made solely to point up the universal recognition of the United States Senate as a continuing body; not only in this country but throughout the world.

Mr. President, let us now examine other sections of the Constitution that are illustrative of the continuing character of the Senate. Previously I have pointed out that the term of office of the Vice President, who is elected for a term of 4 years as President of this Senate by virtue of Article I, section 3 of the Constitution, is in no way related to those sections of the Constitution which provide for the organization and time of meeting either of the House of Representatives or this Senate. The rules of the Senate were present and effective when you assumed the chair.

Article II, section 2, provides:

> He (the President) shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law; * * *
> The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session.

From this section of the Constitution, nothing could be clearer than it is the intent of the charter for the Senate to take on a character far different from that of a strictly legislative body. To a large degree, it is from this section that the belief was expressed in the Federal Convention that the Senate would, in all probability, be in constant session. As a matter of fact, from the years 1789 to 1937 the Senate has been called in special session on 47 distinct occasions. These were special sessions where the House of Representatives was not called contemporaneously with the Senate.

Section 3 of article II of the Constitution gives to the President the specific power to "on extraordinary occasions, convene both Houses, or either of them," and this is the authority whereby the 47 special sessions of the Senate were convened.

Both the original text of the Constitution and the text of the 17th amendment authorizes a State executive to make temporary appointments to fill vacancies in the Senate. No such authority or authorization exists insofar as a vacant seat in the House of Representatives is concerned. Clearly those who drafted the constitution and the 17th amendment were here acknowledging that the different character of the Senate required provisions for the office of Senator when vacant to be immediately filled so that equal representation of the States in a continuing body could always be achieved.

Article I, section 3 of the Constitution, provides:

> The Senate shall choose their other officers, and also a President pro tempore, in the absence of the Vice President, or when he shall exercise the office of President of the United States.

The first act of the Senate, on April 6, 1789, was to proceed by ballot to the choice of a President for the sole purpose of opening and counting the votes for President of the United States. John Langdon of New Hampshire was elected. He ceased to serve as President of the Senate and as President pro tempore on April 21, 1789, when the Vice President appeared in the Senate Chamber and was escorted to the chair.

The phraseology of this section of the Constitution is open to wide debate as to whether the literal meaning of the language is that a President pro tempore shall be elected whenever the Vice President is absent from the Senate or when the Vice President shall exercise the office of President of the United States.

My illustrious predecessor, Senator J. Z. George, took the position in the historic debate of 1890 over the office of the President pro tempore that the office terminated when the Vice President reappeared for the purpose of presiding over the Senate. The issue was resolved against the position taken by Senator George. In my judgment, the debate on the technicality involved here in language interpretation had nothing whatsoever to do with the concept of the Senate as a continuing body. It would be such under the Constitution even if a President pro tempore were elected every time the Vice President left the chair.

However, the language and application of the resolution adopted on March 12, 1890, is absolutely conclusive as to the continuing nature of the Senate. It provides:

> Resolved, That it is competent for the Senate to elect a President pro tempore, who shall hold office during the pleasure of the Senate and until another is elected, and shall execute the duties thereof during all future absences of the Vice President until the Senate shall order otherwise.

William P. Frye of Maine, under this resolution, served continuously as President pro tempore of the Senate from the 54th Congress, February 7, 1896, until April 27, 1911, during the 62d Congress when he resigned. His only reelection to the office coincided with the expiration and start of his 6-year senatorial term. His tenure in the office was more than 14 consecutive years.

Senator Willard Saulsbury of Delaware was elected President pro tempore in the 64th Congress and served through the 65th.

Senator Albert B. Cummings of Iowa was reelected President pro tempore in the 67th Congress and served until March 6, 1925, in the 69th Congress.

Senator Moses of New Hampshire, reelected President pro tempore in the 70th Congress, served in the office continuously through the 72d Congress. An effort was made to displace Senator Moses in 1931. The Senate was deadlocked in the balloting. The contention was reelected President pro tempore in President pro tempore was highly privileged and could not be displaced as the Senate's unfinished business by a mere majority vote. A motion was made that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the proposed "lameduck" amendment. The Chair overruled a point of order against the motion. To a parliamentary inquiry, whether if the pending motion should be carried the President pro tempore would continue in office, the Vice President replied:

> He will * * * Under the resolution of 1890 * * * the President pro tempore serves until his successor is elected.

By a vote of three to one, the Chair's ruling on the point of order was sustained.

The same practice and procedure prevails down through today. Our beloved colleague, the senior Senator from Arizona, who was elected President pro tempore at the outset of the 85th Congress, is continuing in that exalted position during this the 86th Congress without loss of office or the necessity of reelection.

As to other officers of the Senate, since the Senate is a continuing body, it has been uniformly held that its officers have no stated term of office, but serve until their successors are selected. By custom, officers other than the President pro tempore have been reelected at the beginning of each Congress. Vice President Curtis stated the proposition from the Chair in 1923 in this language:

I think the officers mentioned hold until their successors are elected. That was so ruled by Vice President Marshall. In recent years it has been the custom to reelect them at the beginning of each Congress.

Any concession or admission that the Senate is a continuing body absolutely requires acceptance of the Senate rules being likewise continuing. If this has been true for 169 years, why should it be considered different today?

Lindsay Rogers in his book, "The American Senate," describes its peculiar characteristics in the language of Senator Henry Cabot Lodge. He says:

Furthermore, since the 6th day of April 1789, the Upper Chamber, as Senator Lodge pointed out, "has never been, legally speaking, reorganized. It has been in continuous, and organized existence for 132 years, because two-thirds of the Senate being always in office, there never has been such a thing as the Senate requiring reorganization as is the case with each newly elected House. * * * There may be no House of Representatives, but merely an unorganized body of Members elect; there may be no President duly installed in office. But there is always the organized Senate of the United States. It has had in full measure what Bryce called collective self-esteem; it has always shown, he might have added, individual self-esteem."

Riddick in his book on "The United States Congress Organization and Procedure" states:

The Senate is a continuing body as contrasted with that of the House. Legally, two-thirds of the Senators of an old Congress return to the subsequent new one without having to be reelected, but all Representatives must stand for reelection every 2 years. Thus the manner and extent of organizing each new Senate have not been established under the influence of definite breaks betwen each Congress as has been the experience of the House, nor have the parliamentary rules of the Senate been equally subjected to alterations. The Representatives readopt their old rules of procedure at the inception of each Congress, sometimes with slight modification, while the Senators have not given a general reaffirmation to their rules since 1789. The identical rules adopted by the Senate in the first Congresses have remained in force continuously with the exceptions of particular additions or abolishments from time to time. Any such changes are made by amending the rules to meet new needs of that august and esoteric group. Changes have not been frequent, as seen by the fact that a codification of the accumulated alterations have occurred on only five different occasions.

Haynes in his monumental work on the U.S. Senate says:

The Senate, on the other hand, is a continuing body. It first effected its organization April 6, 1789, and there never since has been a time when the Senate as an organized body has not been available, at the President's summons or in accordance with the terms of its own adjournment, for the transaction of public business. The first rules, adopted only 10 days after the Senate came into being, have continued in force without reaffirmation until amended or abolished by the Senate. In contrast with notable revisions of the House rules, the few Senate revisions have been significant of no urgent spirit of revolt or reform; they have been authorized when the accumulation of changes through a long series of years made a new codification desirable.

The Supreme Court of the United States commented on the continuing nature of the Senate in the case of McGrain v. Dougherty (372 U. S. 135) in this language:

The rule may be the same with the House of Representatives, whose Members are all elected for the period of a single Congress; but it cannot well be the same with the Senate, which is a continuing body whose Members are elected for a term of 6 years and so divided into classes that the seats of one-third only become vacant at the end of each Congress, two-thirds always continuing into the next Congress, save as vacancies may occur through death or resignation.

Mr. Hinds in his collection of precedents says: "The Senate, as a continuing body, may continue its committees through the recess following the expiration of a Congress"; and, after quoting the above statement from Jefferson's Manual, he says: "The Senate, however, being a continuing body, gives authority to its committees during the recess after the expiration of a Congress." So far as we are advised the select committee having this investigation in charge has neither made a final report nor been discharged; nor has it been continued by an affirmative order. Apparently its activities have been suspended pending the decision of this case. But, be this as it may, it is certain that the committee may be continued or reviewed now by motion to that effect, and, if continued or revived, will have all its original powers. This being so, the Senate being a continuing body, the case cannot be said to have become moot in the ordinary sense.

Mr. President, this opinion of the United States Court simply states a truism that has never been questioned in regard to the character and composition of the United States Senate. Further, the fundamental character of this body is not like a coat that can be put on or taken off at will. If the Senate is a continuing body for one purpose, such as the committee's structure discussed in the opinion, it must inevitably follow that it is a continuing body for all purposes, and the most fundamental and generally recognized ingredients of this continuity are embraced in the rules under which the Senate has operated since April 6, 1789. The rules provide the method and manner by which changes therein can be made. When we arbitrarily depart from the precepts therein laid down, when we deliberately and knowingly evade and violate the prescribed methods for change, we completely transform the character of our constitutional system of government.

The issue presented here today strikes at the roots and foundation, the warp and the woof, of mankind's greatest achievement in erecting a political structure under which the individual citizen can live with the maximum degree of liberty, freedom, and opportunity under law. History bears eloquent witness to the fact that the seeds of tyranny can find root only when the freedom of speech and expression is denied. This has been true since the birth of western civilization, when the tyrants rose up to seize and destroy the Greek city states by denying freedom of debate and expression. It was the cause of the downfall of the Roman Republic. When the gag rule was invoked in the Roman Senate and Catilina was carried screaming from the senate, Caesar became the state. Mussolini, Hitler, Stalin—where can we look today and not see the evidence that loss of free and open speech and expression is not the first step along the road to totalitarianism?

I am the instrument and handmaiden of expression of my sovereign State. The one part of our Constitution that cannot be changed by amendment provides that my State shall forever have equal representation in this Senate with all other States. When the gag rule is imposed on me, it is not only imposed upon my State, but also upon the Constitution itself.

Mr. President, it must be admitted that to proceed at this point to adopt new rules for the Senate is at least, for the purpose of adopting the rules, a declaration that the Senate is not a continuing body. It is also admitted that the reason for this novel procedure is to achieve certain legislative aims believed to be impossible under the existing rules. In this regard I call to the attention of my colleagues on the other side of the aisle—but it is equally apropos to those of us on this side of the aisle—a profound statement made by Senator Taft during the rules debate which took place on March 17, 1949. He said:

If we ever admit that Senators, in voting on rules, should permit their opinion on proposed legislation to determine their vote instead of the meaning of the rules, there would be no rules in the Senate, and we would be subject to the arbitrary wishes of a Presiding Officer and a majority of those present.

Mr. President, let me repeat this sentence. It is so important and so fundamental:

If we ever admit that Senators, in voting on rules, should permit their opinion on proposed legislation to determine their vote instead of the meaning of the rules, there would be no rules in the Senate, and we would be subject to the arbitrary wishes of a Presiding Officer and a majority of those present.

This is the identical situation we are confronted with today. The issue is not legislation. It is a revolutionary plan to change the character of the Senate so that the Senate will, as Senator Taft says, "be subject to the arbitrary wishes of a presiding officer and a majority of those present." Is there a Senator present who will deny that that will be the effect of the adoption of the pending resolution? Is there one of us present who will search out his heart and not say that if this result is achieved, while one may cry today, another will cry tomorrow?

Just what is this so-called majority? If we held to strict adherence of the party plan and system it would first depend upon the caucus. Fifty Democrats could constitute a majority of the Senate, but 26 in caucus could bind the party to a party-line vote and carry the issue when in truth in fact 76 Senators were in opposition. Is this a fair example of a majority?

A present quorum is 50 Senators. When 26 Senators out of 50 present vote yea is that the sacred majority? If those 26 Senators just happened to be from the 13 smallest States representing a population according to the 1950 census of 6,380,002 people against a population of 141,606,862 people in the remaining 36 States, is that an illustration of how the sacred majority operates?

Mr. President, the word "majority" in a political, governmental or legislative sense is a most illusory term. It can have legal definition only to the peculiar set of circumstances to which it is applied. Starting with fundamentals we do not have a government wherein the majority of the people rule. What the people, through the States, gave to the Central Government through the instrument of the Constitution was a republican form of representative government with only certain specific, enumerated and delegated powers. Except for the constituency of the Senate, which cannot be changed, the charter can be amended only by agreement on the part of two-thirds of Congress and three-fourths of the States or the alternative of the legislatures of two-thirds of the States proposing a convention and three-fourths of the State legislatures ratifying the proposed amendments. Not only are the terms "two-thirds" and "three-fourths" employed here, but the two-thirds and three-fourths represent States and not the numerical population of the United States. If there is one spot on earth where the word "majority" has no meaning, it is in the Constitution of the United States.

One coordinate branch of the Federal Government, which in this day and time is unquestionably wielding certain legislative powers, is so far removed from the control of the people and the theory of majority rule as to be appointed by the President for a tenure of life, wholly or completely divorced from the control of the people or the electorate.

Many of the measures that are proposed and passed in the Congress are punitive in nature and call for prison sentences when the law is violated. I have not yet heard it proposed on the floor of this Senate, or seen a resolution introduced for an amendment to provide that a vote of the majority of the jury sitting in judgment on the case should be sufficient to convict a defendant in a criminal action.

A sovereign State can be subjected to punitive legislation equally as well as an individual. Much of the proposed legislation which a rules change is designed to achieve is directed against what is called State action. Do we concede to an individual the right to be convicted by a unanimous verdict of 12 of his peers and now argue that a bare majority of 25 States could pass punitive legislation directed against the remaining 24 as States?

Mr. President, the surface has not been scratched in examining the profound implications that are inherent in any allegation that the Senate is not a continuing body. An elementary question that must be answered is this: If this country has survived and prospered for a period of 169 years with the Senate as a continuing body and with continuing rules, why is it now necessary to destroy it as constituted and transform it into a new and different type of legislative body? If the theory of discontinuity became a fact, chaos and confusion will reign supreme. Without lodestars or guideposts, we will struggle to erect a new and different structure on the grave of the world's greatest deliberative body.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I would again like to state that I am unalterably opposed to further empowering the Senate or any portion of it to limit debate. I would strongly prefer to completely abolish all cloture provisions from the rules.

For 125 years, from 1789 to 1917, there was no cloture rule in the Senate. Although there have been many changes in the material aspects of our life, the basic problems of man's relation with man are the same. We could operate as effectively now with unlimited debate as did the Senate during the first 125 years of our existence under the Constitution, which was by no means the least difficult period of our existence.

It has been alleged that one of the principal objections to unlimited debate is that it forces compromises on extreme legislation. It is well to recall in this regard that the formation of the Union by 13 sovereign States was in itself a compromise. Out of this compromise came the Senate in which we now serve, an original, unique and—I might add, judging from historical precedents and the vote last Friday—a continuing parliamentary body.

The substance of the compromise which brought about the formation of the Union was the protection and safeguards given to each sovereign State and groups of States from the majority of their sister States. The procedure designed to implement the substance of the compromise included not only the institution of the Senate, but also its so-called peculiarities, including unlimited debate.

These political innovations, of which unlimited debate was the cornerstone, provided the escape valve which has permitted the continued existence of the Union. They form the practical procedure by which our Federal system is differentiated in operation from a national system of government, which would never have been acceptable to those States which formed the Union. It was never intended that the Senate should enact legislation aimed at and opposed by a particular section of the country, and which is abhorrent and injurious to that section. The method which historically has been used to prevent such an occurrence is unlimited debate in the Senate. Already unlimited debate has been subjected to the will of a so-called two-thirds constitutional majority in derogation of 125 years' successful experience with unlimited debate from 1789 to 1917. The federal system is based on the wise decision of the Founding Fathers to form a Union of sovereign States, in which the Union had limited fields of activity. Thus were avoided the constant revolutionary pressures which would have eventually flowed from a national system of government in this large and dissimilar country. I am convinced that the destruction of these basic safeguards would be the final step in the conversion of our Federal system of government into a national system in fact. With this escape valve of political restraint removed, the very existence of the Union would surely be in peril.

With this thought in mind, consider just what Senate Resolution 5 would do to limitation of debate. If considered from a viewpoint of the historical record of cloture attempts in the Senate, the practical effect of the change it proposes would appear minor. In fact, had the rule proposed by this resolution been in effect throughout the history of the country, no formal vote on cloture in the Senate would have been changed.

There is another approach, however, which indicates the enormous extent of the proposed change. Under the existing rules, the affirmative vote of 66 Senators is necessary to end debate. Under the proposed change, it would be mathematically possible under the present composition of the Senate to end debate by an affirmative vote of 34 Senators. Such a result would be, of course, an extreme case, for attendance on the sessions of the Senate would have to be poor indeed. Lest we assume that such an occurrence is too remote for consideration, however, I direct your attention to the fact that when the extremely vital issue of the Federal antipreemption legislation came to a final vote in the closing days of the last session, only 81 of the possible 96 Senators were recorded as voting. If this be an indication of the trend of regularity of attendance, we can easily foresee action by the Senate on important issues when a quorum is barely present.

This proposed change in rule XXII is one more step in the systematic destruction of free debate in the Senate which began in 1917. Between 1789 and 1917, there was no limitation on debate. In 1917, a cloture procedure by two-thirds of those present and voting was made applicable to all motions except motions to proceed to consideration of any measure. In 1949, further restriction on debate was made possible by the rule change which made cloture applicable to all procedures except a motion to proceed to a consideration of a rule change. Now it is proposed to remove the last item not subject to cloture from the possibility of unlimited debate.

Have we changed so much that we could not again operate with unlimited debate? Absolutely not.

The idea is often expressed that we live in a changing world. In this age of nuclear energy and space exploration, we are prone to emphasize changes at the expense of ignoring those things which remain constant. Preoccupied as we are with the material aspects of life, we are inclined to assume that nothing is unchanging. If we will subjugate our egotism for a moment of reflection, we can readily comprehend that changes occur only in things made by man, and that all other things remain the same.

Predominant among things unchanging is the Creator, himself. Despite the fluctuating and fickle faith of mankind, God, in His omnipotence, is constant. Similarly, God's creation remains constant, and it is only man's knowledge that varies. For instance, man has recently abandoned the belief that matter can be neither created or destroyed, but at the same time we learned that matter and energy are equated. Our knowledge has thus increased, but the laws of nature, instituted by God for the regulation of His universe, are unalterable.

Man, himself, was God's greatest creation. Although he has been given a soul, and the power of reason and choice, man also remains unchanging, as does human nature—that combination of emotion and reason which govern his conduct.

Since the dawn of history, men have repeatedly established governments. Despite the fact that many governments were instituted for the preservation or establishment of individual power, and as such, were initially oppressive, man has always realized that the only noble purpose of government is to facilitate harmonious relations among the governed. At its best, government is a servant of the people, a reasoned contract among men for their mutual conduct. To government, man also turns for the conduct of matters which are equally paramount in importance to all the contracting parties, such as defense of all from a common enemy from without.

None can deny the usefulness of government as a means of self-enforcement of basic limitations on man's instinctive or emotional, as contrasted to his reasoned, activities. Unfortunately, the dangers of government are too often overlooked or ignored, for government is the most inherently dangerous to man of any of man's institutions.

Government is a basic instrument for good only so long as, and to the proportionate degree that, it commands the respect and support of all the people. Christ, Himself, ordained the preeminence of the individual, and the degree to which the individual can be subverted to the group, without destroying the individual, is slight. It is fundamental that the more areas into which government is injected, the greater is the probability of divergence of opinion, and the less popular is support of the government. Similarly, the more areas into which government is injected, the greater the concentration of power; and in the concentration of power, the subjugation and oppression of the individual most often occur.

As the concentration of usurped power in the Federal Government continues at an alarming pace, we must protect at all costs those remaining safeguards against tyranny, and if possible, bolster them.

As I have pointed out, nothing has changed which affects the legislative problems of our country since the 125-year period when the Senate had unlimited debate. There is no valid reason for not returning to this worthy principle by abolishing all limitation on debate. Certainly a step in the other direction, as proposed by Senate Resolution 5, is unthinkable.

When legislation has sufficient merit to garner the enthusiastic support of a majority of Americans, even the most extended debate cannot prevent its passage. As to civil rights legislation, the majority leader has himself pointed out that a majority of Senators can, and did in 1957, pass such legislation as they truly desire under the present rule.

Let us not deceive ourselves nor the public. Rule XXII is the strongest restriction of debate that the welfare of the country will bear, and the pending resolution to change it should be defeated.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, the resolution now pending before this body would restrict the powers of the States and those who represent the States on the floor of the Senate. I shall oppose the resolution for that reason, as well as others.

There is a racial problem in the South. Great progress was being made quietly and rapidly by the people who live with it day by day. Great strides were being made to improve the lot of all until we of the South had too much interference from outside sources. When the hysteria of this question subsides, the people of the South of both races, containing many men of commonsense and good will, will begin once again to repair the damage done and continue our forward strides.

The racial problem will not be fully resolved so long as there is such strong political incentive to keep it alive. The rules fights and civil rights bills are launched on a political basis and should be defeated by large votes and thereby discouraged from being brought forward so often with their harmful rather than helpful effect.

We should direct our energies and activities toward increasing economic opportunities for all—enabling people to meet existing opportunity through migration or otherwise.

Local cooperation should be encouraged, not submerged by Federal bayonets.

The whole idea of force should be repudiated. It has never worked. It has only divided the country. The Civil War, the Reconstruction period, the school cases and their resulting violence, and the 1957 civil rights bill have done nothing to promote harmony and unity in the United States.

Idle schools in our troubled cities are mute testimony to the folly of the concept of force.

Civil rights legislation is one of the major purposes of Senate Resolution 5. I have already addressed the Senate on two other major phases of the resolution. This time I shall confine my remarks largely to this third point.

Civil rights legislation is one of the major purposes behind this rules fight. More legislation of this type would have its primary adverse effect in the South, but the country as a whole will suffer. It should be borne in mind that once Senate procedures for deliberation and consideration are discarded, the South will not be the only victim of some future legislative battle. Other geographical areas or labor, business can also suffer because these safeguards have been cast aside.

Let us not, then, further pursue this unwise course. Let us, instead, devote our energies toward full development of our economic and natural resources, providing opportunities for a higher and better standard of living for all through the free enterprise system. This will give us a firmer base, a more united nation to face the challenges of free world leadership.

Through meeting the challenges of foreign markets and world trade and greatly expanding our foreign commerce, we can reach toward our full capacity for production and distribution. This should lead to more efficient methods of production and stabilization of the purchasing power of the dollar. With a broader tax base and larger gross national product, we can afford, at the local level, more and better schools and other community institutions. Those who profess great concern for the "underdogs" among us need no longer fear a return to the States of their rightful power over local affairs.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN] such time as he may require.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, we are almost at the voting point on the resolution which would change the present requirement under the rule from a constitutional two-thirds majority to a two-thirds majority of Senators present and voting. I shall vote against this proposal, because I believe that it is not necessary; nor do I believe that it would be in the interest of the country as a whole to change the present rule.

Mr. President, one thing that should be kept in mind by all of us is that very often rule XXII is referred to as a rule which permits filibustering. It is not that at all. It is just the opposite. It is a rule which makes it possible to curb filibustering. Up to the time rule XXII was adopted as a part of the Senate rules, back in 1917, there was no way to stop filibustering. I submit to the Senate, as has been said so often in the course of the debate, that no harm has been done to anyone under the operation of the rule we have at the present time, and I believe it should be continued.

Incidentally, a few days ago, Mr. Roscoe Drummond wrote a column entitled "Filibusters Have Saved Many Liberal Causes in the Past." He calls attention to the fact that it made it possible for Senator George Norris, that great liberal of a few years ago, whom many of us knew and whom many of us had the privilege of seeing on the floor of the Senate, to prevent the Government from selling Muscle Shoals and the right to expend it. Mr. Drummond also points out that exhaustive debate enabled Senator Robert Taft and other Senators, only a few years ago, to prevent President Truman from drafting striking railroad workers into the Army.

I remember that debate quite well. I was a Member of the House of Representatives at the time, and I remember the speed with which the bill was rushed through the House.

I was surprised, and a great many others were surprised, when it was stopped in the Senate. However, after the incident had become history, I believe everyone felt that Senator Taft rendered a service to the country and to the cause of democratic processes when he exercised the right of extended and exhaustive debate in order to prevent the pushing of that measure through the Senate.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. Is the Senator laboring under the impression that Senator Taft filibustered against the Truman proposal to draft railroad workers?

Mr. SPARKMAN. He spoke at length.

Mr. MORSE. Is the Senator——

Mr. SPARKMAN. And other Senators also took part in the debate. I realize that there is always the question as to what is a filibuster and when is a filibuster. I did not use the term "filibuster." I used the term "extended debate." I submit that at that time Senator Taft and other Senators spoke rather extensively and were able to hold up consideration of that measure on the floor of the Senate and thereby kept it from becoming law.

Mr. MORSE. Would the Senator be surprised to know that Senator Taft spoke for a very, very, short time?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Regardless of that, I say that there was extensive debate. It ran for—I do not remember how many days it ran, but it ran for several days here on the floor of the Senate. By reason of the fact that he could not be choked off by a simple majority, he was able to carry on.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Senator Taft and his associates carried on the debate.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I am not sure, but I believe the Senator from Oregon was in the Senate at the time, and he may have participated in that debate.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I am quite certain that if he was here he did take part in that debate.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. We finished it in less than a half day.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I am sorry. I do not believe the RECORD will bear out that statement of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MORSE. The real issue before us was whether we were going to vote that afternoon, as was requested, and Senator Taft objected, and under the rule of the Senate the bill had to go over.

Mr. SPARKMAN. But it was debated.

Mr. MORSE. Very briefly.

Mr. SPARKMAN. For 3 or 4 days.

Mr. MORSE. Not under a filibuster.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator from Illinois realizes that the discussion we are now having will not change any votes, but it is also true that there are some persons who read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Therefore I do not wish the Senator from Alabama to get by, so to speak, with the argument he is now using. Is it not true that under the proposal which was voted down today, we would have permitted from 6 to 8 weeks of debate?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Well——

Mr. DOUGLAS. Just a moment. If 3 or 4 days was sufficient to kill the Truman plan, what would 40 or 50 days of debate do?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I have used up more time than I should have used under the generosity of the assistant majority leader. I will only say in reply that, in the words of the Senator from Illinois, upon which I would be willing to rely, we might have saved weeks of debate, but, nevertheless, had the proposal of the Senator from Illinois been in effect, a bare majority could have cut off debate.

I remind both the Senator from Oregon and the Senator from Illinois that I was quoting from Mr. Roscoe Drummond's article with respect to the railroad debate. However, I remember it. I remember it quite well. I remember coming over to the Senate. I was in the House of Representatives at the time, and I came to the Senate to listen to the debate.

Mr. President, I conclude with this statement. We have done quite well under this rule as it is written at the present time. No one has suffered. I believe that the rule ought to remain unchanged.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks the column by Mr. Roscoe Drummond, to which I have referred.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FILIBUSTERS HAVE SAVED MANY LIBERAL CAUSES IN THE PAST

(By Roscoe Drummond)

The debate on changing Senate rule XXII, which would increase the action power of the majority and decrease the delaying power of the minority, could not come at a better time than right at the opening of Congress.

No major legislation will be ready for at least a month. Important hearings can proceed. There will be ample time for all the arguments to be heard without holding anything up.

All the merit is not on one side in this dispute. The issue sometimes gets blurred because of the tendency to use epithets instead of looking behind the words to see what is really at stake. Filibuster, for example, has become a nasty word with many liberals although the filibuster has been used to protect many liberal causes.

Before arguing what should be done, let's look at the facts.

Question. What does rule XXII provide?

Answer. It provides that there shall be no cutting off debate on any matter unless 66 Senators in the new Senate vote to do so.

Question. What is the purpose of this rule?

Answer. Its end purpose is to make sure that the will of the majority shall not be lightly and hastily imposed upon the minority. It accomplishes this end by guaranteeing that there can be thorough, exhaustive, and sometimes exhausting debate. It makes sure that the minority shall have ample opportunity to marshal all of its strength, all of its arguments, and to rally public opinion to its side if possible.

Question: When does exhaustive debate end and filibustering begin?

Answer: There is no easy answer to that one. One man's filibuster is another man's debate. Obviously when a Senator begins reading the telephone book or counting the inches to the moon, he is abusing the privilege of nearly unlimited debate.

I agree emphatically with those who believe that the requirement of 66 votes to end debate is excessive and should be reduced, but it seems to me we should think a long time before making it too easy to close off debate. I think that closing off debate by a majority vote would be too easy.

Let us realize that it has not always been rule XXII, requiring a two-thirds majority of the membership of the Senate, which has stood in the way of stopping a filibuster. A determined minority can usually best a majority in part populated by those giving only lipservice to that majority. That is what has happened more than once when civil rights legislation failed prior to 1957. It has as often been the weak convictions of the majority as it has been rule XXII which gave the filibuster its strength.

Extended and exhaustive debate enabled Senator George Norris to prevent the Government from selling Muscle Shoals and enabled Senators Robert Taft and Claude Pepper to prevent President Truman from drafting striking railway workers into the Army. Extended and exhaustive debate seems to me an invaluable protection for every minority group in the Nation, whether political, racial, or color.

What will the Senate do about rule XXII? It will do one of three things: (1) Reduce the vote required to cut off debate * * * 66 to two-thirds of those present and voting; or (3) permit a simple majority to end debate, perhaps after some time limit.

Among these three alternatives, I like the middle course.

It will make it less difficult to end debate—but not too easy.

It will make it impossible for Senators to put their vote surreptitiously against ending debate by just absenting themselves from the Senate. It will make them stand up and be counted.

It will permit a moderate reform to be fairly tried before voting anything more sweeping.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I wonder whether the minority leader would yield me some time.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I shall be glad to yield 10 minutes to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Technically I should ask for time from the minority leader.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I shall be glad to yield 10 minutes to my distinguished colleague.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I thank the Senator from Montana, but I think technically I am using the proper procedure.

Mr. President, I have never been one to insist that everything must go my way. I have always been willing, after I have been defeated on attempts to improve a bill, to be ready to vote for the bill if it produces any significant change. I voted for the voting rights bill of 1957 even though the broader civil rights section in part III had been eliminated.

However, the present resolution does not improve matters, and I am going to vote against it. I believe I should state the reasons why I am going to vote against it.

The Senate had an opportunity to make a real improvement in the rules, but it has failed to do so. It turned down a perfectly proper proposal, namely that debate could be limited by a majority of the Senate after 15 days of debate, and that thereafter each Senator could speak for an hour. In reality, as we have pointed out, this means that debate could have been extended on any one motion for some 4 to 6 weeks, and similar tactics could have been used on the motion to take up as well as on the motion itself. Therefore the record is abundantly clear that the motion which about 14 Senators proposed would have provided for abundant debate.

But it would have freed the majority from the tyranny of a minority.

We failed on that proposal. Then another proposal was advanced, the so-called three-fifths proposal. I believe everyone of us who had voted for the majority proposal then voted for the three-fifths proposal, and eight Senators in addition. Had that carried, I would have voted for the resolution. It did not carry.

Then proposals were made by the Senator from New York and the Senator from New Jersey either to modify or to eliminate section 3 of the resolution, which made the rules of the Senate continuous from one Congress to the next Congress. Had either one of these carried, I would have voted for the bill.

Therefore the resolution in its final form, comes to us without any improvement whatsoever.

It is perfectly clear from the record of past votes over the years in the Senate that no real change has been made by section one of the bill. It is clear that on measures of importance on which a filibuster would be conducted, virtually the entire membership of the Senate would be present on the floor for the final vote. Therefore there is no real difference between two-thirds of the total membership, which is the present provision, and two-thirds of those present and voting under the Johnson resolution.

On civil rights measures I think it is fair to say that this could not make a difference in the requirement for cloture of more than two votes, possibly less than that, because on such measures, the absentees would only be northerners, not southerners. This proposal therefore does not diminish the real power of a minority to prevent a vote being taken by a majority.

Section 3 is a distinct step backward. It gives strong moral authority, and possibly constitutional authority, for continuing this restrictive provision at the beginning of the next Congress, and thus making it more difficult to modify the rules of the Senate.

Section 2 may be a slight step forward, but not a very great step, because in practice, on the rules change which most interests me, I think a two-thirds requirement will be as effective in preventing a vote from being taken as unanimous consent; and in addition the two-thirds requirement can seldom be met on issues of civil rights.

So I see no real improvement over the present situation effected by the resolution as a whole. Under those conditions, I see no reason why any Senator who wishes to improve conditions should vote for the resolution.

I can see many reasons why Senators should not vote for it. We who feel this matter very keenly will be judged, in part, on how we vote on the adoption of the resolution. I will not judge my colleagues, but the public will be judging us. If we vote for the resolution, it will be said, "Well, it must have been an improvement, or else you would not have voted for it." But it is not an improvement.

Moreover, it may act as soothing sirup to lull the conscience of America, so that the drive to decrease the danger of the filibuster will be slowed. There is a very skilled group of public relations men who are ready to do just that. So a vote for the resolution may be regarded as tacit approval of the measure, as being something which the country should favor, should accept, and should not question in the future.

I believe this situation has to be changed. I believe the present filibuster rules of the Senate must be changed. It will be much more difficult to change these rules as a result of the action today and as a result of the passage of this Senate resolution. It will be made still harder by every northern and western affirmative vote.

I do not want to see the civil-rights program and the advocates of civil rights led up the Appian Way, with fetters and shackles upon them, and marched into the forum of Washington as prisoners of war and exhibited to the populace, as the Romans used to bring back those whom they had conquered in combat, in cages, laden down with irons and shackles. I will not be led up to the steps of the Capitol with those shackles around me. I have always thought it would have been better for those defeated by the Romans to have died on the field than to have been led in chains before some Caesar.

I may have some embarrassing company among those who also will vote against the resolution. I know that a considerable number, probably most of the opponents of civil rights, and most of the defenders of the filibuster, will vote against the measure. I know what will be said: The Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] and the senior Senator from Illinois will be said to be allied with the Senators from Mississippi, Alabama, and Georgia. They may be as embarrassed in our company as we are in theirs.

I say, in all seriousness, that I regard their opposition to the resolution as purely symbolic. They have won a great victory with the aid of their skilled field marshal and with the aid of the majority leader, and the leadership of the Republican Party, too. They have been able to blunt, and not only to blunt, but to reverse, the drives for civil rights and an effective antifilibuster rule which seemed so promising a few short weeks ago. Whatever they may say on the floor, I feel certain that in their inmost being they are chuckling. This has been a great day for them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Illinois has expired.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I wonder if I might be granted 6 more minutes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield my distinguished colleague 6 more minutes.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I thank the Senator.

This has been a great victory for them. I am sure that while they may not say this openly, they know what has happened. It is a great victory which has been won for them by the leadership of the Democratic Party in the Senate and the leadership of the Republican Party in the Senate.

The old bipartisan coalition has been working beautifully: Conservative southerners on the Democratic side; conservative Republicans on the other side. This is the coalition which has been operating for 20 years. It is still in effect.

Now I shall say something which will hurt me, but in the interest of fairness I have to say it. They have been joined in this struggle largely, but not exclusively, by the small States, particularly States of the West.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I should like to yield to my friend from New Mexico, but I must continue.

I criticize no Senator for his vote; but if we examine the votes, it is apparent that a third element has now been added to the coalition, namely, most of the small States of the West. This is not an invariable rule. There are exceptions to it, and I say all honor and credit for those exceptions. But we now have a coalition, in the main, of the Mountain States, the small Western States with the old coalition of conservative Republicans and Southern Democrats.

The people of the industrial States, which have the overwhelming proportion of the population and pay the overwhelming proportion of the taxes, are left out in the cold, with no attention paid to them. The new coalition now constitutes the political power in the Senate.

This coalition has been able to fasten its rule upon the people of the United States. I do not propose to bless it with my vote.

I shall not criticize either in public or in private any of my colleagues who vote differently from me. I shall not accuse them of deserting the ship. I think they take their stand on honest ground. But I think they are very much mistaken.

This has been a black day for the people of the United States. The majority has virtually said that in the foreseeable future there will be no meaningful civil rights legislation. It has said that a small minority of the Senators can prevent action desired by a majority of the Senators, and a still larger majority of the people of the country.

The majority has placed the seal of approval upon John C. Calhoun's doctrine of "concurrent majority"; namely, that the representatives of one section of the country can veto a measure desired by the Nation as a whole.

May I remind the Senate that the section of the country which can impose its veto in civil rights matters is a section in which political control is exercised by a relative minority, by means of the poll tax, by the disqualification of Negroes, and so forth. So there will be a minority of a minority section of the country virtually preventing the rest of the Nation from acting.

Those are the realities which I do not propose to bless with my vote. I shall vote against the resolution. I shall not cease to struggle on civil rights, because it is an issue which should be kept before the American public. But the chances of our getting civil rights legislation in the near future are extremely slight.

I think the leadership of the Democratic Party in this body has made a crucial mistake, one which will return to haunt my party, not merely in 1960, but also in the years ahead. I think the leadership of the Republican Party has made a similar mistake.

I shudder for the future of my country, when great reforms which are needed can be prevented by a minority of a minority. I shudder to think what will happen, because we are making it more and more difficult for peaceful and constitutional processes to provide some solution for the injustices under which millions of our fellow Americans suffer. God protect us from the tragic consequences of this fateful day.

For these reasons, I shall vote against the Johnson resolution.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield 5 minutes to the senior Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MORSE. I am proud to rise in support of the position just announced by the senior Senator from Illinois. I shall summarize as best I can, and quickly, the reasons for the vote against the resolution which some of us will cast this evening. Since I spoke earlier this afternoon, there have been some cloakroom meetings of those of us who from the very beginning have supported the Douglas-Humphrey-Case of New Jersey-Javits proposal, and later the Cooper-Morton proposal. As a result of those conversations, we find that our ranks have become divided with respect to the final vote. I shall summarize very quickly the reasons why I shall vote against the Johnson resolution.

First, I want to answer the half-a-loaf argument made by some of my friends who are now announcing that they are going to vote for the Johnson resolution. Their argument is that it contains some advance in the fight to check the filibuster in the Senate. As I said in conversation with some of them this afternoon, the arithmetic does not show that what they claim is true, because from 1917 to 1949, when the voting formula of the Johnson resolution was in effect in the Senate (the Senate was not able to muster a single vote that would block a filibuster on a civil rights issue. What makes anyone think that is going to change in the future? In fact, I think that the action that is being taken in the Senate tonight will strengthen the minority in the Senate which is able to exercise its will upon the majority to prevent good legislation from passing.

In the course of the debate, the challenge has been made from time to time that the threat of a filibuster has never prevented legislation from being passed on the floor. I answered that argument the other night, naming specific pieces of proposed legislation that were blocked in committee, and in the Senate by the mere threat of a filibuster. But this afternoon we find the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER], in his argument, specifying legislation that has been blocked as a result of the threat of filibuster.

To the half-a-loafers, I want to say they will not even get a slice of legislative bread out of the Johnson proposal; all they will get will be the political wrapper, and that is not edible. The Johnson proposal will not make it any easier to stop filibusters in the Senate than it was from 1917 to 1949. But, it is said, paragraph 2 of section 3 in the Johnson proposal provides:

> The rules of the Senate shall continue from one Congress to the next Congress unless they are changed as provided in these rules.

I never expected to hear any of the proponents of the Humphrey-Douglas-Javits-Case position in this debate say that this was any gain, because what has been their theory? I have never accepted their theory that the Senate is not a continuing body because under article I, section 5 of the Constitution, at the beginning of each new Congress the Senate has the power to adopt its own rules. Do Senators think they can change the Constitution by adopting the Johnson resolution? The Constitution of the United States cannot be amended by any such procedure. Therefore, paragraph 2 of section 3 of the Johnson proposal is but political window dressing. It is but decoy bait. It has no legal effect on any future Congress, Mr. President, because this Senate cannot bind a future Senate under article I, section 5, of the Constitution. Every lawyer in the Senate knows it, or should know it.

So, Mr. President, I speak as one who has never accepted the idea that the Senate is not a continuing body. It is for some things; but as a continuing body the Senate always has the right, under article I, section 5, of the Constitution to adopt new rules at the beginning of a new Congress. I am not going to swallow the kind of bait held out to me by the majority leader as a justification or a rationalization or an alibi to vote for this resolution.

Mr. President, as one who yields to no one here in the Senate for the protection of minority rights, I say to my friends that I recognize no minority right that permits any small group of willful men to prevent the people of this country from having legislation that an elected majority, after full debate, decides in the Senate is in the public interest. That is basic to self-government.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. MORSE. I ask for 2 more minutes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield 2 additional minutes to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MORSE. That is basic to self-government. Under the Douglas proposal, or the Morse proposal, the minority is fully protected for days and days of debate. I am not going, in the name of liberalism, to vote for the Johnson proposal on the basis of the fallacious argument that it is the way to protect minority rights.

The last argument is an ad hominem one, which was actually made to us in conferences today. The question is asked, "Do you really want to vote and have the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD show you voted on the same side of an issue as the southern supporters of the filibuster in the Senate?"

If I ever heard of an ad hominem argument, that is it. My only answer to it is to ask the question, Is the Johnson proposal in the interest of the public? In my judgment, this debate has shown it is not. I do not care who else votes for my position, and for what reason. I know that there are a good many southern Senators who are going to vote against the Johnson proposal; but, as the Senator from Illinois has pointed out, the Johnson proposal has not in any way effectively jeopardized the position these men take in favor of the filibuster in the Senate.

I am going to vote against the Johnson proposal because I cannot reconcile it with the Democratic Party's platform of 1952 and 1956. I cannot reconcile it with majority-vote rule in the Senate. I cannot reconcile it with what I consider to be the public interest. I shall be proud to have my descendants read that I did not cast any vote based on an argument of expediency and a compromise of principle.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. LAUSCHE].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, I have taken the position that the Senate cannot, by a rule, change a condition declared by the Constitution of the United States. In my opinion, for the Senate to pretend that it is able to adopt rules which would restrict the right of future Senates to act is completely meaningless and in violation of the Constitution.

Secondly, I voted for the Morton amendment believing that a 60-percent rule would be a fair rule and reasonably capable of bringing filibusters to an end. I do not believe the resolution which is now pending before the Senate makes it possible, with any degree of certainty and facility, after prolonged, honest debate which has converted itself into a filibuster, to bring a filibuster to an end.

I cannot subscribe to the proposition that the Senate can adopt a rule in violation of the Constitution. I do not feel that a rule providing for a two-thirds vote of those present and voting is adequate to bring a filibuster to an end. On that ground, I shall not vote for the resolution.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, I believe that my record in the Congress and in the Senate would indicate to anyone who is reasonable that I am just as liberal as is any other Member of this body. I do not try to be professional about it, however.

The question of whether or not the rule should be changed is another matter. The Senator from Illinois has stated that he wants to be able to vote on civil rights. I would be willing to vote right now, and I think that I would vote on his side. But that is not the issue before us. The issue is whether or not the Senate is to change rule XXII.

Mr. President, who is sorry for the advancement and the progress—political, social, and economic—which the United States of America has made up to this moment under rule XXII? Hence, so far as I am concerned, a question of liberality is not involved. The question is whether we shall carry on those policies which have made for the progress of this Nation.

I personally do not think I would be here in the Senate, and I do not believe that my colleague from the State of Arizona would be in the Senate, if the Senate were as limited in debate as the House is. The big States would have blocked us. When the Senate was created, the Founding Fathers had the idea that, irrespective of how much population any State, the State of Illinois, might have, for example, each State should have equal representation in the Senate, now and forever.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Will the Senator yield me 2 additional minutes?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I yield the distinguished Senator from New Mexico 2 additional minutes.

Mr. CHAVEZ. For now and forever the two Senators from Illinois cannot checkmate the two Senators from New Mexico, no matter what our State population. We belong to the Union also.

So far as the southerners are concerned, the Civil War was over many years ago; the South is a part of the United States of America. I am not voting because they are southerners. I am voting because I think it is right that we should carry on in the American way. Illinois has no more Senators than New Mexico has, and I wish to assure the Senator from Illinois that we shall take care of ourselves anywhere. I am going to vote for the Johnson resolution no matter whom it may hurt.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I yield 3 minutes to my distinguished friend, the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. CASE].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey is recognized for 3 minutes.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I shall vote for the Johnson resolution because it represents, in section 1, an affirmative, though very small, advance in the direction of controlling the filibuster.

Also the resolution, by section 2, will eliminate the undoubtedly invalid exemption from any cloture at all of motions to take up changes in the rules.

I have considered carefully whether these very small gains would be outweighed by the provisions of section 3, which purports to limit the power of the Senate, at the beginning of each new Congress, to adopt new rules. I have concluded that, under the Constitution, section 3 would not, and could not, have that effect. To that extent, section 3 is a nullity.

It is highly distasteful to vote for a measure which contains an invalid provision—a provision which I would oppose to the end if it had any binding effect. Yet I have finally concluded that, for me, it is not a sufficient reason to forego such improvement, however slight, as the resolution represents in the respects already mentioned.

Mr. President, I do not have to tell the Members of this body that this in no way involves any criticism at all of any Members who wanted, with me, to obtain an effective change in the rules of the Senate, and who will vote against the resolution. I agree with them utterly that it is a very sorry day for the Senate when this good chance to make an effective change has been wasted.

But while the battle has been lost, the war has not been lost; and eventually—and, I hope, very soon—what we have failed to do here today will be done.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. SCHOEPPEL].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas is recognized for 2 minutes.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, in the interest of conserving time during the closing minutes of the debate on the resolution which is before us, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD some remarks I have prepared in favor of Senate Resolution 5.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR SCHOEPPEL

There is a story that on his return from France, where he was serving his country while the Constitution was being written, Thomas Jefferson called on President Washington. At the breakfast table Jefferson demanded to know why Washington had agreed to a second Chamber in the legislature. "Why," asked Washington, "did you pour that coffee into the saucer?" "To cool it," replied Jefferson. "Even so," said the President, "we pour legislation into the senatorial saucer to cool it."

James Madison, one of the great scholars among the Founding Fathers, succinctly put it thus: "The use of the Senate is to consist in its proceeding with more coolness, with more system, and with more wisdom, than the popular branch."

This story and this quotation illustrates what the writers of the Constitution considered to be the foremost quality of the projected Senate: its unparalleled ability to provide full and deliberate attention to all important measures. To gag the Senate with a rule which would allow cloture at the whim of a mere majority would destroy the essential nature of the Senate.

It has been said that the Senate sits in a kind of appellate capacity in relation to the House of Representatives. The right to free and full debate permits the Senate to inspect with all necessary care proposed legislation. It permits time for public opinion to be fully informed and to express itself. Democracy simply cannot function, Mr. President, if the electorate is not fully informed. The great freedom of debate and discussion which characterizes the Senate is an invaluable method for attaining that goal.

We are also greatly concerned in the Senate with the protection of the rights of the minority. This is also an element of democratic government, but one which is often forgotten by an arrogant majority. The relatively easy imposition of cloture would threaten the minority with a virtual dictatorship of the majority. Cloture is a tool which lends itself to the building of political machines, machines that would increase in power to the detriment of the individual Senator as well as the minority.

Without this freedom of speech the Senate would shortly become another House of Representatives, and I do not speak disrespectfully of that great body—rushing measures through at breakneck speed with only scanty consideration of the complexities that so often surround the problems with which we deal.

There has been a great deal of exaggeration spouted about the practice of the filibuster. We must remember that it is a weapon very seldom used. We must remember that it is a weapon used only as a last resort, as a protection of vital sectional interests. It is highly doubtful, in my opinion, that any proposed legislation which could arouse such antagonism as to goad opponents into the use of the filibuster can do the unity of the country much good.

No really vital piece of legislation, sincerely and determinedly desired by a great majority, has ever been permanently defeated by a filibuster. A determined majority eventually gets its way. But we know that many undesirable pieces of legislation have been defeated by debate that has run its full course.

Any rule, any freedom, is subject to abuse; and I would not deny that the freedom of speech permitted in the Senate is occasionally misused. But so is the freedom of the press abused on occasion; so are other freedoms misapplied. Surely we would not abolish those freedoms because of their infrequent misuse.

Rule XXII, as it presently stands, undoubtedly makes the imposition of cloture definitely difficult. While believing in the fullest possible debate, I also believe that, once that debate has taken place, once the public has been fully informed and has had an opportunity to express itself, then the Senate should be able, if it is fully determined to do so, to come to a vote on crucial issues. For this reason I support the suggestion that rule XXII be changed so that cloture may be imposed by a vote of two-thirds of the Senators present and voting.

I support Senate Resolution 5 as a constructive piece of legislation.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, the remaining request for time has come from the distinguished senior Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS]; and at this time I yield him 5 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. President, I have had the dubious honor of participating far more than one of my years of service in the Senate should have participated in the debate, on this side. I would be stating less than the truth if I did not state that I have had a hard time in connection with my consideration of the pending question.

It will be recalled that I supported, successively, the Douglas plan, of which I had the honor to be the principal protagonist in the Committee on Rules and Administration, and then the Morton-Cooper plan, which provided for the invoking of cloture on the affirmative votes of 60 percent or three-fifths of the Senators present and voting.

I certainly think that on the basis of those two affirmative votes, no one can say that I am unreasonable. However, I shall have to take my chances as to that.

Mr. President, my colleague, the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. CASE], and I have been hotly engaged in this fight, and we are about to take divergent paths. We will win the war, although we may have lost this battle.

In that connection I have to answer this question: What soldiers will fight the war, or who will be around to fight it? I think that is a question I have to answer.

Mr. President, after prayerful consideration—bearing in mind that I served on a two-man subcommittee which fought this battle through long hearings and great difficulties, and that I had the honor of writing the report with respect to the position we have taken on the floor, and that I hope to have the honor, so long as the people of my State allow me to remain in the Senate, to continue this fight with dignity and with propriety at the beginning of each Congress, at the right time. I find it difficult to say to myself that I can in 1961 rise for an argument similar to this one unless I have kept intact my position at least as a lawyer. I would be willing to abandon that position as a lawyer if I saw a meaningful gain in what we are offered by the Johnson resolution. But, Mr. President, history shows us that it is meaningless and is no gain at all, because the same rule resulted in the fact that only four filibusters have been successfully ended since 1917; and that occurred under the rule contained in the Johnson resolution, not under the rule now in the Senate rules. So by means of the Johnson resolution, as I see it, we shall gain nothing on that score.

As for a filibuster on the question of a rules change, I state advisedly that is dead. I do not believe there will be a filibuster on a rules change, whether because of the Vice President's ruling or because of the self-restraint of the Members who might filibuster. I believe that such a filibuster is dead, because I believe that such Members will realize that to filibuster would be very much against their interests.

What is left is—in all honesty—this question: What is the constitutional question which I, as a lawyer, have to answer?

Mr. President, as a lawyer I am deeply convinced that one Senate has no right to bind a succeeding Senate. I think that is fundamental. We can make rules for ourselves, but we cannot bind those who follow us.

I do not know what important issues may arise during the years down the corridor of time. I shall keep my powder dry, so that I can fight for what I consider to be the fundamental constitutional issue for the country in the days ahead, an issue which is far more important than the infinitesimal change in rule XXII which is sought to be made by the particular Johnson resolution under consideration, if it is a meaningful change at all—and I do not think it is. I feel I must vote "Nay."

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I yield 3 minutes to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCNAMARA].

Mr. MCNAMARA. Mr. President, in the debate earlier today on the Douglas amendment to permit a constitutional majority of the Senate to limit debate after proper steps were taken, I said we had two goals in this issue.

These goals, briefly stated, were these:

First, to bring about a greater degree of democracy in the U.S. Senate by easing the filibuster hammerlock that has too often immobilized this body.

Second, to permit civil rights legislation to come before this body in the normal course of events for consideration on its merits.

Now, as we come to a final vote on the resolution, I must ask myself this question: Will the Johnson resolution, now before us, enable us to make either or both of these goals?

Will the Johnson resolution, which simply says virtually the same thing as the present rule XXII, do anything to make the Senate any more democratic?

Will the Johnson resolution, if adopted, make it any easier for us to get civil rights legislation before the Senate for the consideration it deserves?

The answer to these questions, Mr. President, is an emphatic "No."

Since it meets neither of the important criteria, I am compelled to vote against the Johnson resolution.

I will not attempt to fool the people of Michigan into thinking that progress has been made here today.

The Johnson resolution is worthless—and, in fact, it may be even worse than that.

I will not vote for it—because if I did I fear I would be doing a disservice to the people of my State, whom I have the honor in part of representing in this august body.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Michigan [Mr. HART].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The junior Senator from Michigan is recognized for 3 minutes.

Mr. HART. Mr. President, as a new Member of the U.S. Senate, I have followed with extreme interest the debate on the right of the Senate to adopt its rules and the need in the Senate for an effective cloture rule.

The debate has given me a new perspective into the history of the Senate and certainly great awareness of the body of tradition which lies with the U.S. Senate.

My vote on the adoption of Senate Resolution 5 will be "nay." My vote will not be an easy vote for me to cast. I feel that my position on the resolution submitted and so vigorously advocated by our majority leader and cosponsored by the minority leader, should be made clear in the record.

If I could believe that the passage of Senate Resolution 5 and the subsequent change in the rules of the Senate of the 86th Congress would make it really more likely that cloture could be invoked in a debate over civil rights legislation, I would support the resolution.

Or if I felt that the adoption of Senate Resolution 5 would make it less difficult for future Senates to change the rules so as to provide for majority cloture, then I would support Senate Resolution 5.

As a matter of fact, it is my belief that neither of these criteria has been met.

As the father of eight small children, I have seen some trading engaged in at home. Sometimes the trade is an apple for a plum or a baseball for a book. Once in a while—usually when the older children are negotiating with the youngsters—it is a trade of a marble for a wrist watch. To me Senate Resolution 5 looks very much like a marble for the advocates of effective civil rights legislation and a wrist watch for those who oppose it.

For these reasons, Mr. President, I shall vote "nay."

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, are there any other requests for time?

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote! Vote! Vote!

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Does the minority leader have any requests for time?

Mr. President, I want to make a brief statement and then I shall suggest the absence of a quorum. If the aids of the Senators will notify Senators, we will proceed to a final vote on the resolution.

Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been requested. Is there a sufficient second?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, many have said—many times for many purposes—that the Senate could not and would never change rule XXII.

Or, at the least, it has been maintained that change could be wrought only after protracted debate—and at the price of a fundamental change in the nature of the Senate itself.

Yet, here we are, ready to bring the changing of rule XXII to a decision on this, our third full working day of the session.

I think the Senate deserves commendation and respect for proceeding as it has. I also believe that some would do well to reexamine their appraisals of the will of the American people.

It is the will of the people that is reflected here. That will is a will—in all sections—for progress, for unity, for reason, and for courage. All these high goals have been served by the Senate's course.

We are making progress.

We are perfecting our unity.

We are maintaining reason.

And the Senators are, I believe, manifesting a courage worthy of those who sent them here.

We make progress by providing that a majority cannot be immobilized when it has the will to proceed.

We perfect unity by assuring that minorities will not be overridden without a right of hearing.

We maintain reason by providing that there will be no procedural gap in the Senate rules to which no standard of responsibility applies.

These, certainly, are gains.

The greatest gain of all is the high standard of courage which the Senate sets here as an example.

This issue is fraught with strong feelings. It is clearly the most divisive domestic issue of our times. There is abroad a popular clamor which holds division itself to be preferable to resolution. This Senate has had the courage to reject that doctrine and, in so doing, to shine a bright ray of hope into an area too long darkened by intemperance and intolerance.

Let us examine what has happened here, for there are lessons to be learned which apply on a broader scale.

It has been the contention of some that the Senate could not work its will. This belief has been broadcast widely. The idea has been fostered that to make progress at all it was necessary to destroy and demolish the Senate as the institution it has been since the Republic was founded.

This course ignores—and has always ignored—a fundamental fact: that the institutions of our freedom serve us only in proportion to our willingness to understand their operation and our diligence in making them work successfully.

Thus, there have been those who were more eager to attack the Senate than to come to an understanding of it. They were more willing to destroy it for its weaknesses than to put in the hours necessary to use its strengths to serve the Nation.

I, for one, have never accepted the proposition that the Senate could not work its will. The evidence against this is far too conclusive.

Let me remind the Senators that in 1957 this Senate passed the first civil rights legislation in nearly a century—amid many forecasts that it could not be done.

Yet it was done.

There was no filibuster.

There was no cloture.

There were 12 separate votes taken—including a vote on a motion to refer the bill back to committee after passage and a vote on concurrence in House amendments.

The Senate worked its will then—just as the Senate is working its will now.

What, I ask, best served the Nation? The labors here to achieve resolution of the issue—or the efforts made outside the Senate to persuade elements of our populace that no resolution would be forthcoming?

My point is this: There are some who stand on the ground that our institutions are not responsive to the times and that those institutions must be swept away if progress is to be made. This appeal is not supportable. Rather, I respectfully suggest that time and progress have passed them by. The people are now ready for men who are willing to work to make the institutions of free men serve responsibly. The people, likewise, recognize the falsity of the expediency which would destroy those institutions as the easier way.

The resolution before the Senate now—and the fact that it is here—testify to the courage and the conviction of the Senate majority.

What we have here is a change—not a compromise.

The majority has not elected merely to dilute extremes and pay a price for consent. The majority has proceeded steadfastly on an orderly, logical course and has fashioned both a strong rule and a reasonable rule.

The resolution does these things—for these reasons:

First, it provides that cloture shall be possible on the vote of two-thirds of the Senators present and voting.

Our present rule provides that cloture can be voted only by two-thirds of the full Senate membership. This necessitates the actual presence in the Chamber of 66 Senators casting affirmative votes. In a body of this size, infirmities and disabilities for one or two Members or more are commonplace. The committee duties of the Senate frequently require some Senators to be absent. The nature of our Nation's world position, also, has resulted in more and more Senators being asked to serve the country at important tasks abroad. Each absent Senator, in effect, cancels two votes of those present.

In our last session, a sampling of the votes shows that on the average 14 Senators were not voting—sometimes as many as 40 and a few times as small a number as 3 or 2. At no time, though, did the full membership vote. The net is that the constitutional two-thirds requirement was, in practice, an actual average of nearly 80 percent or four-fifths.

By returning to the standard which applied here—with reference to cloture—until 1949, we are merely reasonable and realistic. If the Senate is able to transact business, it will be able to consider the cloture resolution without absences detracting from the Senate's ability to act.

Two-thirds is the division by which we provide for amending the Constitution, for ratifying treaties, and for expelling Members from the Senate. It is an established, traditional division and we are maintaining it by this resolution.

The second provision of this resolution is, perhaps, the most important—although some have chosen to disregard its presence.

Our present rule XXII specifically exempts from cloture any motion to proceed to consideration of a change in the rules. This is the only such gap in our rules. Cloture can apply to substantive issues. Cloture can apply to a vote on the rules themselves. No cloture, however, can be applied to this one motion.

Thus, in present form, this means that debate could conceivably run on with no power to limit it when, in effect, there was no real subject matter before the Senate. This invites obstruction which serves no real purpose. It is intolerable to a majority and unnecessary for a minority, where the minority has a case to present.

The change now proposed would close this remaining narrow gap and permit the majority to maintain a standard of responsibility on this as on more important motions.

Finally, the third provision of this resolution would write into the rules a simple statement affirming what seems no longer to be at issue. Namely, that the rules of the Senate shall continue in force, at all times, except as amended by the Senate.

This preserves, indisputably, the character of the Senate as the one continuing body in our policy-making process.

It precludes the involvement of the Senate in the obstruction that would occur—or could occur—if, at the beginning of each Congress, a minority might attempt to force protracted debate on the adoption of each Senate rule individually.

These are changes. They are substantial changes. Yet they are not punitive changes on the one hand, nor meaningless changes on the other.

We close the circle of the Senate's ability to proceed responsibly.

We affirm the continuity of the Senate's role.

We assure that if the Senate is able to transact business it shall be able to consider the cloture issue on any decision before it.

These are gains. With the gains come responsibilities.

After this resolution is adopted, none can hide behind the Senate as an excuse against the necessary and demanding work of finding resolutions for the problems of our people. All sides will be able to proceed to the real work—and that work has been neglected by some who have belabored the Senate instead.

By adoption of this resolution, the Senate demonstrates itself to be an institution of freedom for all the Nation—and men who would serve freedom will apply themselves to the more constructive work of understanding and employing the strengths of this institution.

Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time on condition that the minority leader will do likewise.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time having expired or been yielded back, the Secretary will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Have the yeas and nays been ordered upon the pending resolution?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question is on agreeing to the resolution of the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON]. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES]. If he were present and voting, he would vote "yea"; if I were permitted to vote, I would vote "nay." I therefore withhold my vote.

The rollcall was concluded.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER] is absent because of illness.

I further announce that, if present and voting the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER], would vote "yea."

Mr. DIRKSEN. I announce that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] is absent on official business and his pair has been previously announced by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG].

The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT] is absent on official business and if present and voting, he would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 72, nays 22, as follows:

ANTI-INFLATION BILL

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, the statement I am about to make is in explanation of the bill (S. 215) to restrain inflation, which I introduced this morning.

Because the President in his state of the Union message on Friday last called upon Congress to stop inflation, and because the "Census of Manufactures" has shown an amazing concentration in manufacture of essential commodities in daily use throughout the country, I have introduced a bill to put an immediate brake on the forces of inflation by requiring the comparatively few companies which dominate the manufacture of materials people use, to give advance notice of price increases. It will restrain inflation by focusing the light of public opinion on rising prices before they go into effect, when something can be done about the situation, instead of afterward, when the damage has been done.

REQUIRES ADVANCE NOTIFICATION OF PRICE INCREASES

Specifically my bill will require that price increases of commodities 50 percent or more of which are produced by 8 or fewer corporations must be filed with the Attorney General, the Federal Trade Commission, and both Houses of Congress 30 days in advance of the effective date of the increases. The bill provides further that the Federal Trade Commission hold public hearings on the proposed increases. This procedure will, I feel certain, prove a deterrent to companies planning to raise prices unduly, as they will be reluctant to explain to the American people, who will have to pay the new, higher prices, their reasons for such increases unless these are clearly justified.

To prevent any undue hardship in cases in which the increases are clearly justified, there is a provision in the bill that the Federal Trade Commission, with the approval of the Attorney General, may waive the 30-day waiting period.

As long ago as 1948, I introduced a measure of this kind. Such legislation is long overdue, it seems to me. When a few giant corporations can fix the prices and the supply for the basic commodities in daily use by 170 million Americans—and this is the situation today—it is past time to realize that the people of the United States have become the subjects of private economic government over which their Congress declines to exercise any restraining influence, although it has the constitutional power to do so.

CONCENTRATION OF ECONOMIC POWER IS EXTREME

An analysis of the "1954 Census of Manufactures" reveals the amazing degree of concentration of economic power in the production of our basic commodities. Of the 27 companies which manufacture the $1.8 billion worth of tires and inner tubes Americans used in that year, 91 percent were manufactured by the 8 largest corporations. Eight corporations were responsible for more than 99 percent of the cigarettes smoked in the United States that year, the other four manufacturers supplying less than 1 percent of the greater than $1½ billion supply. Although 109 companies were engaged in the manufacture of tin cans and other tinware, 8 companies produced 88 percent of the supply. And of the more than a billion dollars' worth of synthetic fibers produced in this country in 1954 by 20 companies, 97 percent was manufactured by the 8 largest. Although 141 companies produced the $1.18 billion worth of tractors, the 8 largest account for 88 percent. There were 267 companies engaged in the manufacture of soap and glycerin, but the 8 largest manufactured 89 percent of the overall supply.

Thus it goes. There is scarcely a commodity in daily demand, from the building of homes to living in them, which is not subject to this concentrated control.

My proposal to throw the light of public opinion on price increases requires no new machinery. The Federal Trade Commission now has the power to conduct investigations of price increases. The only thing new about my plan is that the hearings would be held before profiteering took place and not afterward, when it can do the people no good.

ECONOMIC COLLECTIVISM LEADS TO POLITICAL COLLECTIVISM

Congress has not hesitated to enforce a cooling-off period on organized labor, which, under the Railway Labor Act and the Taft-Hartley Act, may not sell its commodity for the price it demands until a certain period of time has elapsed. If we can freeze the wages of labor, certainly we can freeze the prices at which a concentrated business organization sells its products; particularly when the public interest demands that Congress halt inflation.

These corporations which dominate—which control—our economic life are collective institutions, managed, not by their owners, the stockholders, but by hired executive managers. They are setting the pattern for political collectivism, and unless Congress acts to stop this concentration of economic power the battle to prevent political collectivism in the United States will be on us before we know it.

The measure I suggest is a perfectly constitutional proposal. The men who drafted the Constitution of the United States gave to Congress the power to regulate commerce. This power does not belong to the President. It does not belong to the Courts. It belongs to Congress, and if the Members of Congress choose not to exercise this power they will not only be abandoning the people to the profiteers, they will be abandoning their constitutional duty to protect a democratic economy in a democratic system.

REGULATION OF TELEVISION

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, in the past several weeks two separate and distinct actions have been taken which are of extreme importance to the television viewers of the country. First, the Federal Communications Commission issued an order declaring TV boosters illegal and today a staff report of the Senate Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce makes separate recommendations on television service.

Television service and regulation is a problem of great concern to the people of Montana and my colleagues, the senior Senator, Hon. JAMES E. MURRAY, and our two Representatives. We have received numerous communications and I feel compelled to discuss this problem briefly here on the Senate floor today.

Boosters of reflectors have been used for some years as a means of extending television service to small communities remote from metropolitan centers where television stations have largely been concentrated. They usually operate on the VHF frequency. They are the simplest and by far the least expensive means of bringing television service to remote areas. Stripped to its barest essentials, a booster consists of an ordinary rooftop antenna strategically located to receive a usable, though normally weak, signal from a distant station. A shielded cable is connected to a small amplifier running to a second rooftop antenna so situated as to beam the signal down into the community to be served and available power supply to feed the amplifier. Such an array receives the distant signal, amplifies it, and rebroadcasts it at low power on the same channel. Occasionally the booster operates as a VHF translator, converting the signal received to another VHF channel to reduce the chance of interference. In nearly all cities where boosters have been installed, contributions are solicited through the community, or memberships are sold in a television club in order to finance maintenance and operation of the system. This type of financing is necessary because no revenue can be earned from this type of an operation.

It is an established fact that booster service is one of the least expensive of the methods for getting television service in small remote communities. Boosters can achieve this low cost because of the simplicity of their equipment and because since they operate in the VHF band, no additional expense for set conversion, UHF antenna, and so forth, is involved.

Although the low power and largely intrastate operations of most boosters seem to many to present a marginal case for the exercise of the Commission's authority, the Commission's power to regulate boosters has been sustained by the courts.

The Commission became concerned about the appearance of booster operations because of the danger of interference with regular television operation and began writing to many individuals to advise them that the operation of boosters was unauthorized and must cease. Although the Commission's action was motivated by a proper concern over a danger of interference it certainly was not designed to win public acquiescence. That is to say that the Commission failed to step in and provide a sound scheme of regulation for boosters and when their spread seemed to create dangers of serious interference, it sought simply to stamp them out without providing any reasonable alternative.

Certainly the Commission's efforts to suppress interference would have been better received in the areas affected if it had shown equal concern over the need to bring television to these communities at a cost they could afford. Residents of the small communities who hit upon these means of getting television service felt that the good resulting from the booster systems was so evident and the alleged dangers so theoretical that they continued their operation.

In October of 1957 Commissioner T. A. M. Craven, the only Engineer Commissioner who has had extensive practice in the engineering business and considered to be one of the foremost authorities on radio engineering in the country, was sent, along with a staff, to the West to look over the booster developments. Upon his return he prepared a special report for the Commission dated November 6, 1957. It was his opinion "that the Commission's first approach to this booster problem was precipitous, unduly rigorous, unrealistic, and was based upon a narrow interpretation of the Communications Act. Commissioner Craven continued in his report:

> Because the Commission failed to recognize promptly the overwhelming public interest factor involved in providing practicable procedures for establishing television service to small communities in the mountainous areas of the West, it is my opinion that this agency has failed thus far to discharge its statutory obligation to make available, insofar as possible, to all the people in the United States, a rapid, efficient, nationwide radio system. Apparently, the Commission did not recognize soon enough that these low-powered boosters are the only practicable way in which the people residing in those isolated areas can secure any television service whatsoever. We have been shortsighted in this connection, as remedial steps could have been and should have been taken long ago. If necessary, changes in legislation should be requested.

Last May, the Senate Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce held hearings in regard to the orderly development of television and devoted a portion of the hearings to the specific problem of bringing service to smaller communities through various devices. After the committee announced the date of its hearings, the FCC instituted a general overall inquiry into the subject of the impact of community antenna systems, boosters, translators and satellites on the orderly development of television broadcasting. It indicated that it was instituting this proceeding as a means to reach conclusions as to the action it may be appropriate to take either by way of Commission policy or legislative recommendations to the Congress.

In the meantime, the FCC in a separate proceeding appeared to have prejudged any action that might have resulted from its overall policy in the above-mentioned proceeding by having announced on December 31, 1958, that it would not adopt standards for VHF boosters.

Commissioner Craven dissented from the Commission's action and stated that it was his opinion that—

> The Commission can and should establish reasonable rules providing for the authorization of VHF boosters on a practical basis.

The staff report issued by the Senate Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce after discussing this most important problem of VHF boosters found that—

First. The Commission has a statutory duty to provide television service for as many of the people in this country as it possibly can.

Second. If VHF boosters are technically feasible, as seems demonstrated by their operations to date, the Commission should accept them as one available tool for achieving this end—which means authorizing such facilities under proper rules.

Third. In enunciating rules to regulate boosters, the Commission should go as far as is practicable in modifying its general rules to permit unattended installations incorporating the simplest possible equipment so that the service can continue to be an extremely inexpensive one within the reach of even very small communities.

Fourth. The Commission is not only entitled to insist that boosters not create objectionable interference, but is charged by statute to do so. However, it should operate on the principle that interference is not to be assumed, but must be proved—and must be shown to be so significant that it cannot be permitted to continue.

When an experienced engineer who has made an on-the-spot inquiry, as did Commissioner Craven, makes the unequivocal statement that regulations can be adopted by the FCC which will permit boosters to operate without interfering with any other services; and the staff of the Senate Interstate and Foreign Commerce, after extensive hearings, makes the findings outlined above, a serious question is raised as to the adequacy of the action taken by the majority of the Commission with reference to VHF boosters. Further, how can the Commission flatly deny the licensing of boosters in one proceeding and still have pending and awaiting final decision an important proceeding in which it will determine its overall policy regarding boosters, translators, satellites, and so forth? Is this not prejudging?

If my analysis is correct, and the position of Commissioner Craven and the Senate staff report sound, plus the pending proceeding involving the overall policy concerning boosters, translators, and the like, then the Commission should reexamine its position and take into consideration the hardships and other problems that may be created as a result of its denying the use of VHF frequencies for booster operations. I am hopeful that they will recognize this and proceed immediately to reexamine this problem. Otherwise, I will urge Chairman WARREN G. MAGNUSON and the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to bring Commissioner

Craven and his colleagues before the committee to explain this divergence in views with respect to the practicality of adopting reasonable rules.

Television has become an important part in the lives of the American families; it is now a major media for educational and entertainment purposes. It seems to me that some arrangement can be arrived at whereby the independent live television stations, the translators, the boosters and cable service can all operate under a regulated pattern; each is important and vital to the cities, small towns, and isolated communities in this country. This is not a problem isolated in the West; it concerns the television viewers in every part of the Nation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a statement I issued on December 31, 1958, be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR MANSFIELD

Upon announcement of the notice by FCC with respect to their order declaring TV boosters illegal, Senator MANSFIELD today stated he has been conferring with the chairman of the Senate Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee who has advised him that as a result of the hearings, which were held by the Senate committee last year with respect to TV in Montana, a report will be issued within a matter of days. Senator MANSFIELD stated further that until such time as the actual order is issued by the Commission, he is not in a position to state what action will be taken to bring about the best possible TV service for the people of Montana. However, Senator MANSFIELD continued, it would appear that 90 days does not seem to be a reasonable period of time for boosters to convert and that it is his intention to make a request of the Commission to give further consideration to the period of time for conversion if this is declared mandatory.

Senator MANSFIELD stated further that so far as he is concerned, it is his intention to continue to see that an orderly plan for television be worked out so that the people of his State will not be discriminated against. Senator MANSFIELD will wait to see the report issued by the committee to be guided as to the next step which will be taken by his and the other Members of the Montana delegation. He further stated that he will not let up in his efforts until such time as he sees that all the people of Montana are able to get television service by the best possible means.

ESTABLISHMENT OF COAL RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT COMMISSION

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, I rise to speak on S. 49, introduced by the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], and in which I have joined as a sponsor, together with my colleague, the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. MORTON] and other Senators from coal-producing States, namely, the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ALLOTT], the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. BYRD], the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH], and the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT]. It is a bill to establish a Coal Research and Development Commission to encourage and stimulate the production and conservation of coal in the United States.

I desire to mention the valuable work done by a fellow Kentuckian, the Honorable Harry La Viers, of Paintsville, Ky., in presenting testimony to the Senate and House Committees on Interior and Insular Affairs, advocating the establishment of a Coal Research and Development Commission.

A few years ago the Bureau of Mines, together with Bituminous Coal Research, Inc., a privately financed research organization, financed, I believe, by coal companies, and assisted by the United Mine Workers of America, conducted a survey of possible areas of coal research. They determined that some 209 surveys should be undertaken as a means of making it possible to take full advantage of the immense energy reserves available in domestic coal. These projects were listed in nine major categories: Coal resources; mining, preparation of coal, storage and transportation; coal combustion; coke and coal chemicals; gasification of coal; coal hydrogenation in oil; and physical and chemical properties.

It is estimated that about 30 percent of the Nation's energy demands are currently being met by coal. If this ratio continues, by 1975 approximately 800 million tons of coal will be produced in the United States. In 1958, less than 500 million tons were produced. But if the highest figure is to be reached, there must be a higher rate of production and new uses, better methods of coal preparation, and more effective and cheaper methods of transportation must be found.

These are some of the factors about which the Commission will make inquiry. The coal operators and the United Mine Workers of America favor the bill. There are many others who recognize the great value of coal to the Nation and the national defense, and are interested in the passage of the bill.

I am particularly interested in the establishment of a Commission because my State, Kentucky, stands third in the Nation in the production of coal, and fifth among the States—at least, before the admission of Alaska—in coal reserves.

Eastern Kentucky coal is the best in the world in metallurgical and chemical properties. West Kentucky coal is one of the best steam coals in the United States, and is also high in valuable chemical properties. Yet, I am sad to say that with all its great material wealth, the economy of the coal-producing area is depressed, coal miners and others are unemployed and without funds or savings, and their unemployment insurance is exhausted. They and their families are in want. The bill will not immediately help these people or the depressed coal regions of Kentucky. We must find quicker help for them.

But the situation in my State points up the necessity of looking ahead, of establishing a coal research and development commission now, in order to devise improved methods to mine and use the rich coal reserves of Kentucky and the other coal-producing States.

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS BY SENATOR MORSE

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I have a series of bills which, in the course of my remarks, I shall send to the desk for printing and appropriate reference. I introduce them tonight only because we have been laboring under a unanimous-consent agreement which has made it impossible for me to introduce them heretofore.

My statements concerning the bills have already received some circulation. I have pledged to introduce them today.

IMPROVEMENTS IN THE RAILROAD RETIREMENT PROGRAM

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, earlier today I introduced for appropriate reference a bill to provide improvements in the railroad retirement program. It was introduced for myself and on behalf of 23 other Senators. I ask that it be printed and appropriately referred; and I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 226) was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

(b) Section 2(d) of such Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "If pursuant to the third sentence of this subsection an annuity was not paid to an individual with respect to one or more months in any calendar year, and it is subsequently established that the total amount of such individual's earnings during such year as determined in accordance with that sentence (but exclusive of earnings for services described in the first sentence of this subsection) did not exceed $1,200, the annuity with respect to such month or months, and any deduction imposed by reason of the failure to report earnings for such month or months under the fifth sentence of this subsection, shall then be payable. If the total amount of such individual's earnings during such year (exclusive of earnings for services described in the first sentence of this subsection) is in excess of $1,200, the number of months in such year with respect to which an annuity is not payable by reason of such third and fifth sentences shall not exceed one month for each $100 of such excess, treating the last $50 or more of such excess as $100; and if the amount of the annuity has changed during such year, any payments of annuity which become payable solely by reason of the limitation contained in this sentence shall be made first with respect to the month or months for which the annuity is larger."

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, the bill which I introduced today would strengthen the railroad social insurance system through amendments to the Railroad Retirement Act, the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act, and the Railroad Retirement Tax Act. It is identical for all practical purposes to the bill S. 1313 as it passed the Senate on August 22, 1958.

A vote on the provisions of that bill was not reached in the House in the last session. In my opinion this was most regrettable because numerous railroad workers and their families urgently need the retirement and unemployment benefits provided by the bill.

A SOUND ACTUARIAL BASIS FOR INCREASED BENEFITS

The bill would serve the public interest by returning the railroad retirement system to an essentially sound actuarial basis and strengthening the morale of railroad workers by providing for them a better retirement and unemployment insurance system.

The increase in taxes and in the compensation base to which the taxes apply would reduce the present actuarial deficit of 4.18 percent of taxable payroll or some $213 million a year to an estimated 0.60 percent or some $34 million a year. This would accord with the request of the President made in 1956 when he signed the stopgap legislation providing a moderate increase in retirement benefits.

The American railroad system which is, of course, one of the most vital and important segments of the national transportation system and which is so important to the Nation's welfare, economic strength, and defense, cannot function without a stable and experienced work force. To maintain such a work force it must compete with other industry which generally provides private retirement benefits supplementary to social security benefits. As my colleagues know, social security benefits were increased substantially in the very last session of Congress.

The increased retirement and unemployment benefits, as well as the financial stabilization provided by this bill, would serve to better the condition of the railroad worker and greatly help the railroads to preserve their efficient labor force on which the industry and the Nation are so dependent.

RETIREMENT BENEFITS

The bill would provide a modest increase of 10 percent in all forms of railroad retirement benefits including, of course, benefits for dependents of deceased railroad workers.

It would permit wives of retired railroad workers to obtain benefits on a reduced basis as early as age 62, as wives of retired workers can now under the social security system. Also, women railroad employees with less than 30 years of service could receive benefits on a reduced basis at age 62.

Disability annuitants would be permitted to earn more in outside employment without losing benefits. Survivor annuitants living outside the United States would be treated in the same manner as those living in the United States with respect to earnings which would disqualify them for benefits. The residual lump-sum benefit would be changed to conform to the increased tax requirements; and the credit base for earnings, for benefit-computing purposes, would be raised from a maximum of $350 to $400 a month.

FINANCING THE RETIREMENT BENEFITS

The taxes collected for railroad retirement purposes would be increased in rate for both employees and employers from 6¼ percent to 6¾ percent until 1962 when the rate would be raised to 7¼ percent. A later rise in the rate would occur if scheduled increases in the social security tax rate carry through. Also, the rate would apply to as much as $400 of monthly compensation as against the present $350 maximum. These changes would pay for the added benefits and eliminate, for all practical purposes, the present actuarial deficiency in the system's financing.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE BENEFITS

Benefits under the unemployment insurance system would be increased to bring the maximum benefit for a day of unemployment or sickness to $10.20 as compared with the present $8.50. Similar increases would be provided for lower steps in the benefits rate. The amount of earnings in the base year necessary to qualify for benefits would be raised from $400 to $500. Sundays and holidays would be treated under all circumstances as other days, and as much as 10 days in the first registration period in a benefit year would be paid for just as in the case of later periods.

For long-service employees with 15 or more years of service the benefit year, now allowing for benefits for a maximum of 130 days, would be extended to provide an additional benefit period of 130 days. Employees with less than 15 but at least 10 years of service would have a similar extension of the benefit, with a maximum of 65 additional days of unemployment. An employee with less than 10 years of service, who has, after June 30, 1957, exhausted his rights to unemployment benefits under present law, would receive additional unemployment benefits for days of unemployment not exceeding 65, which occur in registration periods beginning on or after June 19, 1958, and before April 1, 1959.

FINANCING THE UNEMPLOYMENT BENEFITS

To pay for all these additional benefits and to assure the solvency of the unemployment system the contribution required from employers would be raised in rate to 3½ percent of payroll, which rate would go into effect when the money in the benefit-paying account falls below $300 million, instead of the present 3-percent rate payable when that balance falls below $250 million. Lower contribution rates would be provided on a step basis when the balance in the account increases, with a minimum rate of 1½ percent to be paid when the account balance reaches $450 million. As in the case of the railroad retirement system the tax and credit base would be raised from a maximum of $350 a month to $400.

As chairman of the Railroad Retirement Subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, I intend to schedule early hearings on this bill. I sincerely hope that within a relatively short time we shall obtain favorable action on the bill in the committee and on the floor of the Senate. In my opinion early action is warranted because increases in retirement and unemployment benefits for railroad workers and their families are long overdue. They will enable retired workers to deal more effectively with the present high cost of living, and the extension of unemployment benefits gives due recognition to the serious unemployment situation which exists in the railroad industry today. The bill is meritorious; its provisions are fair and equitable; its enactment will provide economic benefits throughout an important segment of our national economy.

PROPOSED STANDING COMMITTEE ON VETERANS' AFFAIRS

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, as I did in the 85th and 84th Congresses, I now submit a resolution amending the Senate rules to establish a standing legislative committee on veterans affairs.

And, as in the past, the proposal again has wide support. Many Members on both sides of the aisle have sponsored this same resolution in recent Congresses. I introduce it now for myself and my following colleagues: Senators HOLLAND, TALMADGE, MOSS, CHAVEZ, MURRAY, LANGER, NEUBERGER, YOUNG of North Dakota, HUMPHREY, GRUENING, JAVITS, MARTIN, KUCHEL, CHURCH, ENGLE, BYRD of West Virginia, CANNON, KEFAUVER, MCGEE, KEATING, BARTLETT, RANDOLPH, and YARBOROUGH.

There is nothing new or daring about this proposal.

It was actually recommended to the Senate in 1946 by the La Follette-Monroney committee, which made so many outstanding recommendations on the reorganization of Congress.

At that time, the list of committees proposed by the La Follette-Monroney committee included a Committee on Veterans Affairs in both the House and the Senate.

As we know, the House of Representatives accepted and carried out that recommendation; the Senate did not.

The result has been a distribution of veterans proposed legislation among several Senate committees.

In the 80th Congress, I may say, I was chairman of the Veterans' Affairs Subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. We did much work on bills affecting and amending the GI bill of rights, then in effect.

But my experience in that capacity convinced me that the Senate should have followed the recommendation of the La Follette-Monroney committee, and should have put veterans proposed legislation under a single standing committee.

It has been a matter of great regret to me that so much desirable proposed legislation, particularly on pension benefits, has passed the other body, only to die in a Senate committee without ever giving the Senate itself an opportunity to pass on it. Pension bills now go to the Finance Committee. It is no reflection on our Finance Committee to point out that its work load from all tax matters, social security matters, and tariff matters is simply too great to permit it to give to pension measures the consideration they deserve.

But we are not doing our duty to the millions of our citizens who have served in the Nation's Armed Forces.

The major veterans' organizations continue to support and endorse the establishment of this committee. It was again recommended in a resolution adopted at this year's American Legion convention.

In submitting it, I sincerely hope it will receive the early consideration of the Rules Committee.

I submit the resolution and ask that it be printed and appropriately referred, and ask unanimous consent that a copy of the resolution be printed at this point in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the resolution will be printed in the RECORD.

The resolution (S. Res. 19), submitted by Mr. MORSE (for himself and other Senators), was received and referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration, as follows:

Resolved, That rule XXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate (relating to standing committees) is amended by—

(1) striking out subparagraphs 10 through 13 in paragraph (h) of section (1);

(2) striking out subparagraphs 16 through 19 in paragraph (l) of section (1); and

(3) inserting in section (1) after paragraph (p) the following new paragraph:

"(q) Committee on Veterans' Affairs, to consist of nine Senators, to which committee shall be referred all proposed legislation, messages, petitions, memorials, and other matters relating to the following subjects:

"1. Veterans' measures, generally.

"2. Pensions of all wars of the United States, general and special.

"3. Life insurance issued by the Government on account of service in the Armed Forces.

"4. Compensation of veterans.

"5. Vocational rehabilitation and education of veterans.

"6. Veterans' hospitals, medical care, treatment of veterans.

"7. Soldiers' and sailors' civil relief.

"8. Readjustment of servicemen to civil life."

Section (4) of rule XXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate is amended to read as follows:

"(4) Each Senator shall serve on two standing committees and no more; except that not to exceed twenty-six Senators of the majority party and not to exceed eleven Senators of the minority party, who are members of the Committee on the District of Columbia, the Committee on Government Operations, the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, the Committee on Aeronautic and Space Sciences, or the Committee on Veterans' Affairs, may serve on three standing committees and no more."

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, on behalf of myself and my colleague the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER], I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill for the relief of Milan Boric.

I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the joint resolution will be printed in the RECORD.

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 9), to provide for the removal of a reservation of timber rights from a patent issued to Ivan H. THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA CHARTER COMMISSION

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, the members of the Senate will recall that in the closing days of the 85th Congress a doomed so-called home rule measure for the District of Columbia passed this body, only to languish and die from attrition and lack of care in the quietness of the House Committee on the District of Columbia. This was not an unforeseen phenomenon. In view of the content of the administration version of home rule—a content, I may say, which was compromised even in its inception—there were few to truly mourn its passing.

In fact, Mr. President, some us warned the Senate that there was no chance that the administration's so-called territorial home rule bill would ever see the light of a committee hearing on the House side. Therefore, we felt that the Senate was engaged in an inexcusable gesture and act of political window-dressing in putting through this body a territorial home rule bill so thoroughly unsound in principle as the bill which the Senate considered and passed at the last session of Congress. Even some of the leading spokesmen for the bill in the Senate, in the course of the debate, admitted that the bill was not sound in principle, as compared with the Neely-Morse bill, the principle of which on three different occasions passed the Senate. However, Mr. President, that is history. I hope we shall not continue to make the same sad record in regard to home rule for the District of Columbia.

The action last year was the fourth time since the establishment of the present form of government in the District that a bill purporting to grant home rule to the District had been passed by the Senate. No home rule act has yet been passed by the House of Representatives. Only once—on May 6, 1948—was a home rule measure even reported to the floor of the House by a committee of that legislative body. Clearly, the time has come to seek to strengthen the chance of home rule for the District by following an approach hitherto untried.

It was for this reason that in the debate which preceded the passage of Senate bill 1846, last August, I submitted an amendment in the nature of a substitute, not so much under the illusion that it would be accepted, but, rather, because I anticipated that the administration bill would perish, and I wished to give notice that in the 86th Congress I would take up the struggle to achieve the municipal franchise for the city of Washington. I wanted particularly to have available in printed form the text of my proposal, so that those who are most concerned could review it.

Mr. President, I now introduce, for appropriate reference, a joint resolution embodying the essence of the proposal made at that time.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the joint resolution be printed at this point in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the joint resolution will be printed in the RECORD.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 10) to establish the District of Columbia Charter Commission, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. MORSE, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there is hereby established a commission to be known as the District of Columbia Charter Commission (hereinafter referred to as the "Commission").

SEC. 2. (a) The Commission shall be composed of seven members as follows:

(1) Three appointed by the President of the Senate from private life;

(2) Three appointed by the Speaker of the House of Repressentatives from private life; and

(3) One appointed by the President of the United States from the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

(b) The Commission shall, at its first meeting, to be called by the member of the Commission appointed pursuant to paragraph (3) of subsection (a) of this section, select a chairman and vice chairman from among its members. Any vacancy in the Commission shall not affect its powers, but shall be filled in the same manner in which the original appointment was made.

(c) Four members of the Commission shall constitute a quorum, except that the Commission may establish a lower number as a quorum for the purpose of taking sworn testimony.

(d) The member of the Commission appointed pursuant to paragraph (3) of subsection (a) of this section shall serve without additional compensation, but shall continue to receive the salary of his regular position when engaged in the performance of the duties vested in the Commission. All other members of the Commission shall receive $50 per diem when engaged in the performance of the duties vested in the Commission.

(f) Service of an individual as a member of the Commission, or employment of an individual by the Commission as an attorney or expert in any business or professional field, on a part-time or full-time basis, with or without compensation, shall not be considered as service or employment bringing such individual within the provisions of sections 281, 283, 284, 434 or 1914 of title 18 of the United States Code, or section 190 of the Revised Statutes (5 U.S.C. 99).

SEC. 3. It shall be the duty of the Commission to make a full and complete study and investigation of matters relating to home rule for the District of Columbia with a view to determining the most practicable and feasible basis on which to establish local self-government in the District of Columbia and to draft in accordance with its determination a proposed charter which would, if approved by the Congress, enable the residents of the District of Columbia to enjoy local self-government.

SEC. 4. (a) In carrying out its duties under this joint resolution, the Commission is authorized to hold such hearings, sit and act at such times and places, take such testimony, and make such expenditures as the Commission may deem advisable. The Chairman of the Commission or any member authorized by him may administer oaths or affirmations to witnesses appearing before the Commission. The Commission shall have such power of subpena and compulsion of attendance of witnesses and production of documents as are conferred upon the Securities and Exchange Commission by subsection (c) of section 18 of the Act of August 26, 1935, and the provisions of subsection (d) of such section shall be applicable to all persons summoned by subpena or otherwise to attend and testify or produce such documents as are described therein before the Commission, except that no subpena shall be issued except under the signature of the Chairman, and application to any court for aid in enforcing such subpena may be made only by the Chairman. Subpenas shall be served by any person designated by the Chairman.

(b) The Commission is authorized to secure directly from any executive department, bureau, agency, board, commission, office, independent establishment, or instrumentality information, suggestions, estimates, and statistics for the purposes of this joint resolution, and each such department, bureau, agency, board, commission, office, establishment, or instrumentality is authorized and directed to furnish such information, suggestions, estimates, and statistics directly to the Commission, upon request made by the Chairman.

(b) The Commission may procure, without regard to the civil service laws and the classification laws, temporary and intermittent services to the same extent as is authorized for the departments by section 15 of the Act of August 2, 1946 (60 Stat. 810), but at rates not to exceed $50 per diem for individuals.

SEC. 6. (a) The Commission shall submit, on or before July 30, 1960, a copy of the home rule charter drafted by it pursuant to the provisions of section 3 of this joint resolution to the Congress, and to the Board of Elections.

(b) Ninety days after the submission of the copies of the charter provided for in subsection (a) of this section, the Commission shall cease to exist.

SEC. 7. With a view to determining whether or not the residents of the District of Columbia favor the proposed charter, the Board of Elections shall, as soon as practicable after it has received such proposed charter, but in no event later than November 30, 1960, conduct a referendum of the registered qualified electors of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 8. (a) For the purpose of such referendum, the Board of Elections shall conduct within the District of Columbia a registration of the qualified electors, commencing as soon as practicable after the enactment of this joint resolution and ending not more than thirty days nor less than fifteen days prior to the date set by the Board of Elections for such charter referendum.

(b) Prior to the commencement of such registration, the Board of Elections shall publish, in daily newspapers of general circulation published in the District of Columbia, a list of the registration places and the dates and hours of registration.

(c) The applicable provisions of section 7 of the District of Columbia Primary Act shall govern the registration of voters for such charter referendum.

SEC. 9. (a) Not less than three days before the date of the charter referendum, the Board of Elections shall mail to each person registered (1) a sample of the charter referendum ballot, and (2) information showing the polling place of such person and the date and hours of voting.

(b) Not less than one day before the charter referendum, the Board of Elections shall publish, in newspapers of general circulation published in the District of Columbia, a list of the polling place and the date and hours of voting.

SEC. 10. The applicable provisions of the District of Columbia Primary Act shall govern the method of voting, the registration of voters, and the interference with registration or voting in the referendum authorized under this point resolution.

SEC. 11. The Board of Elections shall, within a reasonable time, but in no event later than January 30, 1961, certify the result of the charter referendum to the Secretary of the Senate, and to the Clerk of the House of Representatives. Notwithstanding the result of any such referendum, the proposed charter referred to in this joint resolution shall not become effective in the District of Columbia without congressional approval.

SEC. 12. As used in this joint resolution—

(a) the term "qualified elector" means qualified elector as defined in paragraph (2) of section 2 of the District of Columbia Primary Act;

(b) the term "Board of Elections" means the Board of Elections established under section 3 of the District of Columbia Primary Act; and

(c) the term "District of Columbia Primary Act" means the Act entitled "An Act to regulate election of delegates representing the District of Columbia to national political conventions, and for other purposes", approved August 12, 1955 (69 Stat. 699).

SEC. 13. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this joint resolution.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, if this measure is enacted, it will accomplish the following:

First, it will establish a Charter Commission, composed of seven members, three appointed from private life by the President of the Senate——

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LAUSCHE in the chair). Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I notice that not one Republican Senator is now on the floor of the Senate. If the Senator from Oregon would yield for that purpose, I would move to abolish the Republican Party.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I rise to defend the absent Senators. The RECORD should also show that there are only three Democratic Senators in the Chamber—one in the chair and two on the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is glad the Senator from Oregon has made that observation; otherwise, the Chair would have felt compelled to do so himself.

Mr. MORSE. Furthermore, Mr. President, my purpose at this time is to place in the RECORD some reading material for some of our colleagues.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield further to me?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I am of the opinion that some of the best speeches made on the floor of the Senate were made by a party which had only one member—namely, the Independent Party; and most of those speeches were made to an almost empty Chamber. But the junior Senator from Louisiana heard all of them.

Mr. MORSE. Oh Mr. President, the Chamber is never empty when the junior Senator from Louisiana is here, because the quality of his presence makes up for the absence of many other Members.

Mr. LONG. But it seems most unfortunate that the Republican Party is not represented in the Chamber at this time, and must rely upon a Democratic Senator to save the Republican Party.

Mr. MORSE. I assure the Senator from Louisiana that the Republican Party will need no protection from any remarks I shall make tonight. I never battle people in their absence.

I make these remarks only in connection with the introduction of various bills and other measures so that in the Committee on the District of Columbia we can proceed with early hearings regarding this joint resolution; and in the other committees we can proceed with early hearings regarding the bills I have already introduced or the bills I shall introduce before I take my seat.

But if I could only convince my friend, the Senator from Louisiana, that we should have a Charter Commission along the lines of the one called for in the joint resolution I have just introduced, for home rule in the District of Columbia, I would be well on the way to victory on this issue this year, because I am willing to venture the prediction here, tonight, that if the Senator from Louisiana would pledge his support to this charter idea of mine, my joint resolution would be passed by the Senate before it adjourns this summer.

If only the Senator from Louisiana will pay attention to what I say tonight, I shall have great hope of ultimate victory in favor of my resolution.

Mr. LONG. I shall be delighted to hear the Senator, but it seems to me we have a wonderful possibility of achieving several worthy objectives tonight. If we could get some understanding from the Senator from Oregon for protection on behalf of those of us who come from former Confederate States, as well as his protecting the Republican Party, the Senate could operate with greater facility for the next year or two.

Mr. MORSE. I may say to my colleague, who is a distinguished descendant of the Confederacy, that all I am doing tonight is continuing a long-established policy of protecting minority rights from any hasty legislation such as proposed by the Senator from Louisiana; namely, to abolish the Republican Party. From my long dedication to supporting minority rights and establishing prolonged debate on the merits of a question, I am sure the Senator from Louisiana knows I could not countenance the suggestion he has made, particularly when he is such a great advocate of protecting minority rights in the Senate.

If he will only give me his ear, or lend me his ear, as is said in one of the great classics, perhaps he and I can get together on the matter of a Charter Commission for the District of Columbia.

Now, with the attention of the Senator from Louisiana, I proceed to point up the first accomplishment of this resolution, should it be adopted.

First. It would establish a Charter Commission composed of seven members, three appointed from private life by the President of the Senate, three appointed from private life by the Speaker of the House, and one appointed by the President of the United States from the present Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia, who would be assisted by a professional staff to be selected by and responsible to them;

Second. It would prescribe the duties of the Charter Commission thus appointed in the assembling of data, the holding of public hearings, and the drafting of Home Rule Charter legislation for the District of Columbia;

Third. It would require that the Commission submit a draft or drafts of proposed charter legislation to both the House and the Senate and to a referendum of the qualified voters of the District of Columbia in such time as to permit a referendum vote upon the draft proposal or proposals by not later than November 1960, whereupon the Commission would terminate.

I have indicated to the Senate that a new road to home rule must be found. The legislation I have proposed, if enacted, would enable this route to be surveyed in an efficient manner, by fully qualified and professional experts in the field of municipal government, under the direction of men and women the caliber of whose impartial public service would be guaranteed by their method of appointment.

The people of the District, through acceptance of the charter by referendum, and the Congress of the United States, through enactment of it, would complete the solid construction of a permanent government sensitive to the growing needs of the Capital.

The argument may well be raised as to why it is necessary, after the full hearings given to home rule legislation by the Senate in past sessions, for this new procedure to be instituted. This is a fair question which deserves an honest answer. Briefly, it may be stated under the following points:

First. Until such a time as the citizens of the District of Columbia can place themselves on record, through the ballot box, as being unequivocally in favor of home rule, no one can state with clear and definite authority that they wish to govern themselves. I am personally convinced that they wish to do so. Most of the witnesses who have appeared over the years before the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia are firmly persuaded that this is the case. We assume it to be true, but we do not know and we cannot know until, in the secrecy of the ballot box, each citizen of the District can exercise his right to pass upon and either accept or reject the home rule proposal presented to him.

I stress the use of the word proposal for another reason also. Many witnesses, as the record of the hearings upon S. 1846 and S. 1289 of the 85th Congress will show, indicated their approval of the administration bill, on the basis that it was the best bill which stood the slightest chance of passage. They would have preferred a true and full home rule charter for the city, as outlined in the Neely-Morse bill, but they feared that the most they could possibly get was the territorial bill, with an appointed governor and a double veto power in the hands of the National Executive, and consequently they testified in favor of the administration's limited bill.

Second. As one reviews the record of past hearings from 1948 to the present, one cannot help but notice that changes over time have occurred in the thinking of many interested in the home rule movement.

An example of a new type of approach to home rule, which was a new one to me at least, occurred as recently as late last session after the hearings on S. 1846 had closed. I refer to the work published in the winter 1957–58 issue of the Georgetown Law Journal inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD by the very able and distinguished chairman of the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia, the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. BIBLE], which was entitled "The Constitutionality of Home Rule and National Representation for the District of Columbia" by Mr. Roy P. Franchino.

Third. The Charter Commission proposal has not been acted upon, as yet, by either branch of the Congress. It was brought to the floor in a committee report as a part of the Legislative Reorganization Act—S. 1400, 79th Congress—but the home rule section was deleted prior to final passage of that act.

There are many of us in the Senate who recall with affectionate admiration the dedicated public service which was so characteristic of the late and truly great Senator from Wisconsin, Robert M. La Follette. To those Senators I commend this Charter Commission proposal as the descendant of the 1946 La Follette Charter Commission proposal, and ask that they give it the same earnest attention that they would have given its legislative predecessor.

In fact, I should like to call attention to the report of the La Follette-Monroney joint committee entitled, "Legislative Reorganization Act of 1956, Report of the Committee." At the very outset of this report, on the first page, we find the following language:

> The Special Committee on the Reorganization of Congress, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2177) to provide for increased efficiency in the legislative branch of the Government, having considered the same, report favorably thereon with amendments and recommend that the bill, as amended, do pass.
> The most important amendment made by the special committee was to eliminate from the bill title VII, self-government for the District of Columbia. The Committee on the Judiciary has favorably reported a bill (S. 1942) to incorporate the Federal City Charter Commission. Title VII of S. 2177 and S. 1942 are similar measures, having the same objective of home rule for the District of Columbia. Attainment of this desirable objective will be expedited, we believe, by the enactment of S. 1942.

This is an interesting bit of legislative history. Does any Member of the Senate really have any doubt why the proposal of the La Follette-Monroney committee for the establishment of self-government for the District of Columbia and for the creation of a charter commission was stricken from the La Follette-Monroney proposed reorganization bill as submitted to both Houses of Congress? Does anyone have any doubt why that was done? I have gone into the legislative history of it, and I tell the Senate tonight that there is no question as to why the committee proposed the amendment which struck the recommendation in regard to a charter commission for the District of Columbia, and put it on the very first page of its report to the Senate of the United States, in the language I have just read, which calls attention to specific bills which have been introduced in an endeavor to get home rule for the District of Columbia.

The reason they did it was that they soon discovered that the Reorganization Act proposal would run into strong opposition if it contained a proposal for home rule for the District of Columbia. They made the decision which is frequently made by Senate bodies, when a committee has before it the problem of doing the greatest good for the greatest number, of accomplishing the maximum objectives possible under a legislative program recommended by a committee. They found it necessary to drop the home rule proposal in order to avoid a great clash on the floor of the Senate and in the House of Representatives, which might have jeopardized the whole Reorganization Act. In this very dignified language on the first page of the report in 1946, they simply invite attention to the fact that they have proposed an amendment to their original report, dropping all reference to the issue of home rule for the District of Columbia, and giving as the explanation the fact that there were pending other bills which specifically dealt with that issue.

Mr. President, that is what we have been up against over the years on this issue. I think it is only fair and proper that we try to give to the people of the District of Columbia an opportunity to voice their own views about this matter officially—not informally; not by becoming witnesses. We should not pick certain leaders to come to the Senate, before the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia, to testify as witnesses in regard to some legislative proposal which has been made. We should give Washingtonians an opportunity to participate in home rule at least to the degree of deciding whether home rule is wanted by them.

When I propose a home-rule commission for the District of Columbia, I am really proposing the exercise of some home rule. I propose to allow the President of the United States, the President of the Senate, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives to appoint the charter commission, and that the commission—not the Congress but the commission—in behalf of the citizens of the District of Columbia, under presidential and congressional appointment, shall hold hearings and make a final report to us, first, as to whether the citizens want home rule at all; and, second, if they do want it, their meeting of minds or the meeting of minds of most of them with respect to the type of home rule they should have.

So I come to my fourth reason in support of this resolution:

Fourth. From a practical political point of view, I am very hopeful that the size of the majority voting in favor of acceptance of a draft charter proposal will carry conviction to the members of the other chamber as to the strength of popular feeling on home rule for the District and thus influence them in favor of ratifying the proposed charter. The Congress to be elected in 1960 will, I am sure, provide a climate of opinion, perhaps more favorable than heretofore, if a large majority of the citizens of the District have voted for home rule for Washington; and lastly,

Fifth. By involving the men and women of the Capital directly in the framing of the charter through charter commissioners appointed from private life who will hold hearings for the purpose of receiving ideas from witnesses as to proper institutional forms and civic procedures, a degree of public interest both locally and, to an extent nationally, will be generated for home rule. This cannot but be intensified as the election day in 1960 draws near.

I might here also point out the fact that the degree of interest in home rule, as measured by the size of the referendum vote, will also, in my judgment, provide a sound argument for requesting hearings on constitutional amendment proposals designed to permit District citizens to cast their ballots for the candidates for President and Vice President of the United States. Although these constitutional amendment proposals do not fall within the jurisdiction of the Senate and House District of Columbia Committees, there is an interest which overlaps such allied proposals as that of presidential franchise and civic franchise and favorable action on either would be of help in enacting the other.

While not committing either the Senate or the House of Representatives to the blind acceptance of the draft charter which will result from the labors of the charter commission if this resolution is adopted, the establishment and successful operation of a charter commission whose results are accepted overwhelmingly by referendum vote of the people of the District will, in my judgment, as I have indicated:

First. Lay to rest the argument that the people of the District do not want to govern themselves;

Second. Permit full discussion of the desirability of new alternative civic institutions and procedures while permitting decision to be taken on policy questions by the electorate;

Third. Allow the Congress to express its will on this method of achieving home rule for the District;

Fourth. Provide a strong argument to a succeeding Congress of the desirability of granting civic franchise for the District; and Fifth. Indirectly, establish arguments for the extension of the franchise to include national elections.

It is my hope that the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia will hold early hearings on this measure so that floor action can soon be taken in this first session.

Mr. President, it was on August 6, 1958, in a speech on the floor of the Senate, that I previously discussed my proposal for the creation of a District of Columbia Charter Commission. I shall not burden the Senate with a repetition of my arguments on the merits of the proposal. I only want the record to show when my arguments were previously presented.

There is also on file in the Senate the report of the District of Columbia Committee of last year on the issue of home rule. It is dated June 16, 1958, and contains my minority views in opposition to the administration's territorial bill. I am sure the Senator will not object to my saying this in his absence, because I know he had a commitment tonight which makes it impossible for him to be present on the floor of the Senate at the present time, but the committee report of the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia last year and the debate in the Senate leaves no room for doubt that the leading exponent of the administration's bill last year was the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK]. The Senator from Pennsylvania made it perfectly clear that, although he preferred the Neely-Morse bill as a matter of principle, he was accepting the administration bill on the "half a loaf" theory. In fact, the Senator jocularly referred to his characterization of himself as "half a loaf CLARK" and complimented me by referring to me as "Ivory Tower MORSE." Of course, I have never had such a high compliment paid to me by any official in any debate anywhere, because as I told the Senator good naturedly, that simply meant I did not buy the compromise of principle, which is what really is referred to by the so-called half-a-loaf theory.

In presenting this proposed charter commission resolution today I am merely following a consistent course of action and one which I announced last year that I would undertake.

Mr. President, I would be perfectly willing to testify in hearings before the District of Columbia Committee on a specific home rule bill if someone wished to introduce such a bill. If someone introduces a territorial bill, as some have said the administration was planning to have done, I shall then be forced to reintroduce the Neely-Morse bill. In my judgment, it would be a great waste of time again on the part of the committee and on the part of the Senate to have this happen, because I do not think that either the Neely-Morse or the administration bill has a ghost of a chance of ever coming up for hearing in the House.

This leads me to the last point I should like to make.

I realize, Mr. President, the stumbling block for years on home-rule legislation for the District of Columbia has been the House of Representatives—and I speak very respectfully of our sister body. I believe that the adoption by the Senate of a charter commission resolution, with a subsequent request of the House to adopt such a resolution, would be very difficult for the House to turn down. It is pretty hard to make an argument against a proposal which merely says, "We ask for the benefit of the advice, ultimately registered by the citizens of the District of Columbia at the ballot box, as to whether they want home rule, and, second, which plan of home rule the majority of the people of the District prefer." It is pretty hard to vote against such a proposal, and at the same time profess to be in favor of democratic procedures and a supporter of self-government.

What we are really asking for in my resolution, to bring it down to a thumbnail, is an advisory opinion from the voters themselves on the issue of home rule.

I never run away from the controlling issue which may be involved in any dispute. I hope the time will never come, but if the time ever should come when we actually are confronted, because of rules of procedure of the House, with a situation in which we cannot get even a proposal for a charter commission out of a House committee, then I hope the elected Representatives in the House from my State, at least, will join in a fight to discharge any House committee which intends to set itself up as a blockade to representative government.

I say very frankly that I think the House of Representatives owes it not only to the people of the District of Columbia, but to the people of the Nation, to allow our democratic processes in Congress to work upon the issue of home rule for the District of Columbia.

I believe that once the people of the District of Columbia vote on this question, the result will have great influence in every constituency represented in the Congress by each and every Senator and Representative.

I said last year, and repeat tonight in closing, that the issue of municipal government for the Capital of the United States is of concern to every citizen of the Nation. I find that as we talk about the problem in any part of the country, North, South, East, or West, when the people come to realize—as many of them do the first time we talk with them—the situation with respect to the denial of franchise and the right of even municipal self-government for the people of the District of Columbia, the people are aghast. They are shocked by the situation. The consensus of opinion which I encounter from coast to coast is "That is not right. It is not American. The situation ought to be rectified."

With all due respect to my colleagues in both bodies, I believe, as this question comes to be understood by the voters of the Nation, it will be discovered that they reject the idea that we do not have very definite responsibilities, as Senators and Representatives, to the voteless people of the District of Columbia.

I offer what I think is a conscionable compromise this year. I offer a compromise which does not in any way violate the principle of home rule for the people of the District of Columbia. At the worst, all one can say is that my proposal entails a postponement of home rule for this session of Congress until the people of the District of Columbia give us the benefit of their advisory opinion.

However, to the degree I have outlined in these descriptive remarks tonight, the resolution, if adopted, would proceed at once to give the people of the District of Columbia some semblance of home rule; namely, the right to determine for themselves at the ballot box what kind of home-rule plan they want.

As I said in my speech, it does not settle the problem of granting voting rights to the people of the District of Columbia in connection with Federal elections. That involves a constitutional question, in my judgment, as I have said before. I intend to deal with that question later in the session.

I make my pledge tonight that before this term of Congress is over I will offer to the Senate of the United States my recommendation as to how we can best meet the constitutional question involved, the end result of which will be to give to the people of the District of Columbia the right to vote in Federal elections.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

INDUSTRIAL USES OF AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I have introduced a bill to carry out the recommendations of the President's bipartisan Commission on Increased Industrial Use of Agricultural Products. In the previous Congress, a number of Senators and Representatives introduced bills. The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry of the Senate advanced a bill, which was, in a sense, a composite of the Members' bills. It passed the Senate unanimously on a rollcall vote. The bill that I have introduced is the bill which passed the Senate last year with one addition. I have included a provision for financing the program. It calls for a use of a portion of the tariff revenues to finance these activities. I believe this a sound procedure and there is a precedent for it.

It is hardly necessary for us to argue that we need new markets for the products of our farms. The way of restrictions and limitations has failed to solve the farm problem and they have proven very costly.

We must turn our attention to new markets. What are those new markets? Great and commendable efforts are being made to increase our exports of agricultural products. This is proving to be very costly. We are subsiziding, for instance, the export of wheat to the extent of about 75 cents or 80 cents per bushel.

But the real problem in reference to agriculture is that the world is producing more of its own food. Many countries that were, a few years ago, deficit food areas now are plagued with a surplus.

The greatest market we can find anyplace for agricultural products is right here at home. The greatest new market we can find is a market in industry. We are living in an industrial age. The American people are using more gadgets, more materials and equipment of all kinds than ever before, and that use is increasing daily.

Many of these industrial uses can be supplied from raw materials produced on the land.

One of the most forceful statements in favor of promoting industrial uses of farm products is contained in an editorial that was published in the Nebraska Union Farmer of December 10, 1958. That editorial reads as follows:

NEW FARM MARKETS

Of all the social and political implications being read into the November corn referendum, only one conclusion appears perfectly safe: With any sort of break in the weather department, we're going to have a lot of corn next year.

Unfortunately, Congress failed to act on the industrial uses bills in the past session which would have set in motion the necessary research and pilot plants to find not only new uses for farm crops, but perhaps new crops as well.

Industrial uses is an almost wide-open field at the present time. Farm products have been badly outpromoted by other industries. As a result, farmers have lost many of their historic markets. But agricultural products have qualities that remain unique, awaiting only the necessary research to find how these qualities may best be utilized for the benefit of mankind.

Such research need not and should not be limited to crops now in surplus. Rather, the entire complex of farm production should be viewed in terms of chemical research plus output, harvesting, marketing, and related functions.

Properly applied, industrial uses may very well lead to new concepts in farming. With research leading the way, farmers soon would find it possible to scale their production for established markets plus such new industries as would rely on the farmer for raw materials.

Industrial uses rates immediate attention in Congress.

This program for promoting industrial uses of products of our farms will not bring a solution to all our problems overnight. I am convinced that, in the course of a few years, much good will be accomplished and that the economic situation of our farm families will be improved. It is a long-range program. If it is undertaken enthusiastically and given wise and sound direction, it can, in the long run, provide a solution to our farm problem. I hope that we can reach the time when the farmers can share in the prosperity and growth of the country as other Americans share it. I hope the time will come when the farmers can once more manage their own land, practice good husbandry, plant all their acres and find a profitable market for that which they raise. The passage of this legislation will help bring that about. It is unfortunate that the program which this legislation would instigate was not started 25 years ago.

This program falls in three parts. The program recommended goes far beyond research.

In the first place, it calls for a broad program of scientific research to find new uses for farm crops.

Secondly, it calls for a program of trial commercialization and pilot testing. Research merely for the shelf does not provide the answer. We must have this trial commercialization and pilot testing. Thirdly, it seeks a program of limited subsidies on a test pilot basis to both farmers and industry to get the program started.

None of us will deny the value of research. Most of the material things that we use and enjoy from day to day are the products of research. The great advances in medicine, that have extended human life, are a result of scientific research. The atom was split and a profound program of peacetime uses of atomic energy awaits us, all because of research.

As the Welsh Commission points out, industry is currently investing at least $3 billion a year, 3 percent of gross sales, in research. The result is obvious in a constant flood of new and improved products—fabrics, plastics, building materials, surface coatings, detergents, chemicals, and many others.

By contrast, agriculture spends not over $375 million on research—about 1 percent of gross sales, and most of this goes to improve and increase production. Federal and State governments spend $190 million of the total, of which no more than $18 million goes for utilization research.

In other words, about one-twentieth of 1 percent of the gross sales of agriculture has been used on research to find new uses for agricultural products.

The result has been that we not only have not found new markets we have lost many of the markets agriculture formerly had. Again, quoting the Welsh report, synthetics and petroleum chemicals have increasingly moved into the industrial markets for vegetable oils.

In the last 20 years, for example, domestic use of paint, varnish, et cetera, increased about 100 percent in the rapidly expanding United States economy. Use of linseed, or other drying oils, increased only about 25 percent. Synthetics took their place. If linseed oil were used in paints today at the same rate as in the early 1930's, the United States would need a million more acres of flax. Per gallon of paint, the use of drying oils has dropped more than 40 percent in the last 20 years or so as they were progressively replaced by synthetic products. Tung oil is affected by the same trend, and that is important to a very great segment of our agricultural economy.

Nearly half of the market for natural fibers—cotton, wool, flax, silk—has been taken over by synthetic fibers. Two out of three pairs of shoes are now made partly or wholly of leather substitutes. Two-thirds of the soap has been replaced by detergents, which do not use natural fats. In fact, in the last 10 years the use of detergents per person increased from 1 pound a year to 15 pounds while the use of soap decreased from 23 pounds to 8 pounds a year.

At the present time we are using more synthetic rubber than natural rubber. It is of better quality. It has been improved because of research. The research has been done by the petroleum industries and they are making the rubber. It is estimated that the consumption of synthetic rubber will increase by 50 percent in the next 5 years.

Were the American farmers allowed to have that increase only and were that rubber made from alcohol provided from farm products, it would require 200 million bushels of grain.

It has long been my hope that we could use alcohol produced from grain as a part of our motor fuel. Farmers buy a lot of gasoline and tractor fuel. Certainly they should be allowed to produce their own fuel. The number of cars in the country is constantly increasing and likewise the motor-fuel market is increasing. European countries have blended alcohol into their gasoline up to 25 percent. Were we to blend alcohol into our gasoline to the extent of 10 percent, it would require more than a billion bushels of grain. In other words, that one use alone could probably solve the grain-surplus problem.

However, we face a very definite obstacle in regard to this. It is an economic fact that gasoline can be produced cheaper than alcohol. Consequently, no one selling gasoline is going to turn to a blended alcohol. In peacetime, under our free American system, we cannot compel them to do so by law.

However, I am thoroughly convinced that a broad program of research will lower the cost of producing alcohol from farm products. At the present time when we make alcohol out of farm products we have a protein residue that is a very valuable food for animals. However, with improved methods brought about by research and trial commercialization, it is believed that the alcohol can be extracted and the protein residue will be a fine human food. Its value will then be many times greater than its value for livestock food. The alcohol will then become more or less a byproduct and it can be sold at a price that it will compete with gasoline for a part of this motor-fuel market.

So, while a portion of the motor-fuel market is not ours at this time, it is not an impossibility from the standpoint of the long-range accomplishments.

A number of leaders in the petroleum industry are not adverse to these efforts. They realize that the farmers are purchasers of their products. They realize that farm prosperity means a great deal to the prosperity of our country. Furthermore, these same companies will be selling the motor fuel at all the filling stations in the country regardless of the components of that fuel. They are not going to lose the business.

Our surpluses are primarily starches. From starch we make alcohol and from alcohol we can make rubber, we can make plastics, we can make a thousand and one things that are now being made from other materials.

We are not limited by any means to motor fuel and rubber and like products. There are literally hundreds of possibilities of making industrial uses of agricultural products. These include solvents, surface coatings, plastics, chemicals, fibers, films, explosives, adhesives, lubricants, insecticides, drilling muds, paints, varnishes, and even paving materials.

Our engineers have brought forth some sound ideas relating to the use of our starches and our surpluses in our starches and in fibers.

For instance, the Welsh Commission report says, as an example, about 35 percent of the corn processed by wet milling now goes to nonfood uses. The industry would like to expand this fifteenfold.

The largest new outlets it envisages are for the use of starch in metallurgy, in insecticides, in defoliants, and in paper. These three uses alone might take up to 410 million bushels of corn annually.

Our country produces great quantities of sugar; we could produce a lot more. Here is what the Welsh report says about the industrial possibilities in regard to sugar produced in this country:

> The sugar industry is confident that these industrial uses will be developed, to the extent perhaps of utilizing an extra million tons of sugar by 1965 and 2 million tons by 1975. This would add more than 10 percent to the projected 1965 demand and more than 16 percent to that projected for 1975. Sugar is an inexpensive, exceptionally pure, and, chemically, very reactive material adaptable for many large-scale industrial applications. Present industrial use is small, but a dozen years of research have turned up some highly promising leads.

We have known for a long time that sugar is the finest food for quick energy, and for industrial purposes it has never been scratched, and we can increase our sugar acreage tremendously by following through on this.

Perhaps the forage crops we produce have the highest value of any crops since they furnish over half the feed for livestock. Yet it is likely that far greater values lie locked up in those crops, particularly the legumes, than those which have been exploited. At the present time, we extract some chlorophyll and some xanthophyll from legumes.

But the Welsh Commission reports that the 55 million tons of legumes produced annually in the United States also contain some things that we have never developed. These include a billion dollars worth of protein, carotene worth $2¾ billion; vitamin E, $2 billion; vitamin K, $115 million; xanthophyll, $12½ billion; and chlorophyll worth $19 billion.

Now, these figures may be a bit fantastic but it shows that these materials are in our legumes, are waiting there to be used and developed for medicinal and other nonfood uses.

I want to quote from the Welsh report in one other instance in reference to potatoes. Here is what it says:

> The potato industry is confident that a materially enlarged research and development program would so expand the market that surpluses would disappear and it might even be necessary to increase production.

I want to talk a little bit about the section on new plants.

The allwise Creator put on this earth 250,000 plants. We have domesticated and used only 150 of them—not 150,000, but 150.

We have never take the trouble to find out what the rest are for. A broad program of research may open up great industrial possibilities from new crops to be raised.

We are short of paper in this country. The American people use more paper products than anyone could ever imagine. Not only is our population going up but the per capita consumption of paper increases. We use it for everything in our homes.

Our publishers sometimes get concerned about the shortage or the threat of a shortage of paper. The task group on new and special crops points out that we can make not only paper but furniture and specialties from bamboo. They further point out that you can produce bamboo in the South from South Carolina to Texas and the coastal and Piedmont areas.

It will grow faster than the pine. This crop could be expanded for industrial purposes so that we could use a million acres of bamboo. This crop alone might solve the surplus problem facing cotton farmers.

We must remember always that what helps any segment of American agriculture helps all of American agriculture, and as a Nebraskan I am just as interested in the problems of the Cotton Belt as any other area.

This same task group made reference to a very fine productivity going on in Nebraska. I refer to the development and improvement of safflower. This crop did not amount to very much until 1946 when the results of research and development of the Nebraska Agricultural Experiment Station were made known. At the present time we raise about 100,000 acres of safflower, most of it in northern California and western Nebraska.

Safflower oil is now being sold to manufacturers of alkyd resins, enamels, varnishes, and high-quality paints. It is believed that with further development in research great possibilities may come from the safflower.

Throughout the years our cordage and rope, particularly the cordage for marine use, has been from abaca and sisal, which are imported products. The task group on new crops points out that sansevieria, a commonly used house plant, known as the snake plant, can be used for cordage and rope, and this promises a market of a possible hundred thousand acres.

Kenaf, the task force points out, can be used to make fiber for post office twine, carpet yarn, camouflage, burlap, and other articles normally made of jute, which is imported. They point out that this new industrial use, when fully developed, could require the production of 200,000 acres.

Another crop mentioned by this same task group was simmondisa, from which we can produce a wax, to be used for fine waxing and polishing. It would be noncompetitive because wax is now in demand in industry. This had a possibility for a hundred and fifty thousand acres of new crops.

We use tannin in the leather industry. It is believed that we could use the production of a hundred thousand acres of canagrie to produce the tannin and it would be competitive in price with our imported tannins.

If a program of broad research and trial commercialization can be gotten underway, it is very likely that many of these things I have mentioned can be developed. It is also very likely that some of them may not prove to be practical.

At the same time, there will be many, many other uses to come out of such industrial research which none of us have ever thought about.

Mr. President, I hope that the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry will, at an early date, again advance this program and that the Congress will enact this measure. A sound solution to our farm problems is one of our most urgent necessities on the domestic front. The income of our farm families should be raised. Freedom of operation should be restored and a program developed that is less costly than our present one.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, JANUARY 12, 1959

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Exodus 33: 14: The Lord said, My presence shall go with Thee, and I will give Thee rest.

Eternal God, whose presence is our help and our hope, may we daily hear and heed Thy voice of companionship and counsel.

Grant that our faith may never be eclipsed by doubt or extinguished by despair as we seek to find the right solution to our many national and international problems.

Wilt Thou inspire men and nations everywhere with those nobler thoughts and feelings which are the progenitors of achievement in the building of a better world.

In Christ's name we bring our petition. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, January 9, 1959, was read and approved.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend to the Members the remarks of Mr. Dooley on "Lunik." Mr. Dooley, the idol of many in the older generation, is still with us through the pen of Roscoe Fleming, who quotes him from time to time in the Denver Post.

"RASCALLY ROOSIANS" OUTDO US AGAIN—MR. DOOLEY VIEWS THE "LUTNIK"

(By Roscoe Fleming)

"Well," said Mr. Hennessey, "I see where the Roosians has got up another satellite—around the sun this time, it didn't even hesitate by the moon."

"Yes," said Mr. Dooley. "Don't it beat all, Hinnissey—ivery time we get an especially loud case iv the brags along comes Ivan an' calls us—only most iv the time he raises, an' then shows an ace in the hole.

"Here a year ago the Russkies put up sputnik while we was still boastin' at our usual rate, an' wonderin' why the rest iv the world didn't just bow down an' take us at our own value, as iv course it wud have to do sooner or later.

"The rascally Roosians had listened f'r years t' how good we were, an' how we had space staked out an' was goin' to make the moon our 51st state whin we got good an' ready, an' go on fr'm there t' homestead Venus and Mars.

"Thin they put up sputnik, an' the shock was terrific. Here we was, acknowledged unanimously by ourselves t' be the center iv the world's civilization an' culture, to say nothin' iv havin' a corner on science an' invention an' ingenuity an' enterprise; beside havin' patented the only system that'd give us all this, an' tailfins too.

"'Thin along come these primitive peasants from the steppes, held back moreover by a Godless tyranny that wuddn't leave 'em think even if they'd a mind to—an' hang sputnik up in the skies f'r all the world to gape at an' admire—an' to begin to wonder is it possible Uncle Sam has overrated himself, an' underrated the rest iv the world as 'lesser breeds without the law?'

"'Science?' says the President. 'What is all this here science? Charley Wilson an' George Humphrey niver told me anything about it.

"'All they told me was that if we didn't quit this foolish spendin' f'r dreamstuff we'd all go broke, which is a fate worse than death, especially f'r the richest nation on earth.'

"So thin we run around in circles f'r a while, worryin' this minute about the budget, an' the next minute whether we'd be the richest nation in the graveyard if we didn't do somethin' drastic, only nobody quite knowed what.

"Thin our scientific an' space boys got on the ball, which they might have been o:: earlier if they cud have kept about four assorted sets iv military brass fr'm breathin' down their necks an' yellin: 'Ain't we got it yet, ye dumb scientists? By the numbers, march!'

"Anyway, we begin to put up our own missiles an' satellites, an' some iv them was not too bad. In fact, we begun stickin' out our chest ag'in an breathin' easier. Ivan was awful quiet over there behind the Urals, and naturally we think maybe he's seen how

THE ADMINISTRATION'S BALANCED BUDGET IS A FISCAL FRAUD

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, today I labeled the administration's balanced budget a "pious fiscal fraud" perpetuated at the expense of an adequate defense program.

As a member of the Defense Subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee, I say the defense budgetary stipulations will not buy as much "hardware" in the next fiscal year as the present procurement program provides. The rising costs are cutting heavily into military programs.

The military budget the administration proposes will not enable us to reduce the gap between our capabilities and those of the Soviets, but rather will cause us to fall farther behind in this all-important race.

It is most regrettable that at a time when the Communists are giving new evidences of their determination to beat America, and are scoring dramatic advances in rocketry, the administration chooses to pursue a course that ignores the challenge. Such ill-advised economy in the defense budget could well prove the most costly and expensive mistake we ever made as a nation.

I point out that the administration has "sequestered" $1 billion of the funds Congress had appropriated to "beef up" military procurement. The committee of which I am a member has provided the billion dollars in question for the specific purpose of expediting research and development to develop nine Polaris weapon systems, to further strengthen our military aircraft, and for second- and third-generation ICBM missiles, the Titan and the Minuteman, and also to provide airlift for the Army's divisions.

In addition, our committee earmarked and provided appropriations to modernize the Army's equipment, and this program has not been undertaken. This modernization program is overly needed and we ignore it at our peril. It is noteworthy that the Soviets have modernized their Army's weapons twice since World War II. The failure of the administration in this respect is all the more reprehensible because spokesmen for the Defense Department gave as their justification for a cutback in Army personnel that they planned to make this up by equipping the fewer men with better and more efficient weapons. It was the contention of the Defense Department that greater, not lesser, firepower would be the result of their cutback of troops.

As a matter of fact, the Congress opposed the Pentagon on the troop cutback program, we favored a larger Army and also the weapons' modernization program; therefore, it is shocking to the Congress that not only is the Army reduced numerically but that the funds for weapons improvement have been impounded by the administration.

We are getting all our eggs in a nuclear basket and are not making the necessary preparations for the efficient conduct of so-called limited wars. Such shortsightedness is an invitation to the Communists to keep probing in peripheral areas.

We must strike hard at the high policy role being played by the Bureau of the Budget. A serious constitutional question is created by the activities of the Budget Bureau. The will and intent of Congress are being flouted by the budgeteers, who are substituting their narrow, negative views for those of the legislators. Before it is too late we must get rid of this bureaucratic heavy hand of repressive influence that is preventing us from attaining the military strength necessary to comfort the stern challenges confronting us. These glorified bookkeepers would cancel America's rendezvous with destiny as they expose our Nation to great peril with their grasping, pennypinching that is not real economy but dangerous foolishness.

President Eisenhower based his case with the voters of the Nation on his military capacity and leadership. It is a shame, therefore, to find the ledger brigade calling the turns and shaping up the country's military programing and policy. There is an urgent need of a thoroughgoing probe to ventilate this situation and publicize the facts of this economy travesty. Another few years of such negativism and our country will be perilously exposed to an aggressor. The situation is tragic when one looks out upon the bumper-to-bumper opulence of America. Yet official policy is rendering this giant impotent. As a part of my remarks I am inserting the following brilliant broadcast and column by Roscoe Drummond:

SOUND (woman's voice). This is Radio Moscow.

SPEAKER (man's voice).

Mr. WALTER CRONKITE. I'm Walter Cronkite, reporting for CBS News. Exactly 1 year ago in the mood crisis that closed with Soviet sputniks, CBS News reported to the Nation on the standings in this sharpened competition. Our conclusion, then, that we have been resting on our oars while Russia was racing with their rockets. Today the jubilant voice of our biggest satellite is drowned out by the signals of Russia's newest and most dramatic space shot. We are taking a second look at the balance, in space and space age military power, in wealth, and in education, the training grounds of two societies in a historic competition. How far have they come and what has been our answer to the challenge? (Music.)

ANNOUNCER. CBS News presents a special report to the Nation, "Where We Stand." Brought to you by ASR Products.

Mr. CRONKITE. The first manmade satellite had a Russian name: Sputnik. And so it appears will the first manmade planet, Lunik as the Russians call their newest and most ambitious space vehicle. Lunik is on its way to become an artificial satellite of the sun. It is the first space machine to have achieved escape velocity, 25,000 miles an hour—fast enough to carry it not merely out of the earth's atmosphere, but also beyond the pull of the earth's gravity. So fast, in fact, that it sails right past its original target, the moon. Latest tracking data to reach our newsroom places the Lunik more than 300,000 miles from the earth—perhaps a hundred thousand miles beyond the moon. Lunik, launched from earth, followed a course something like this: shooting past the moon, and then pulled by the gravitational pull of the sun itself, moving into an orbit around the sun very much like our own planet, earth. And it will continue doing that indefinitely. The Lunik has shown more dramatically than ever the Russian's considerable skill at guidance, and their power—their ability to lift vehicles much heavier than our biggest satellite, the Atlas. The Atlas is more than a piece of high altitude theatrics. The relays of Presidential greetings have opened up new possibilities in communications. The device that nudged it into orbit by remote control is a new and successful guidance technique. The Atlas' huge size is deceptive. Its payload or measure of a rocket's power comes nowhere near that of the sputniks. With our talking satellite, we did not take over the lead, only the spotlight, and only for the moment. The long-range view of our plan, CBS News Correspondent George Herman called on the man now in charge of our space experiments, Dr. T. Keith Glennan, head of NASA, the new National Aeronautics and Space Administration.

Mr. HERMAN. Mr. Glennan, does the United States now have a long-range national space program, and if so, how far do future developments of such a program extend?

Dr. GLENNAN. I think I would have to say that our first task in NASA is to really develop a long-range national space program which will include undoubtedly both efforts by the military and civilian agencies. Such a program should extend a long, long way into the future because one must look forward to man's exploration of the moon and the planets. As of the present, I think one would say that we're working on a very short range program which is really made up of the first attempts to try to understand a little bit about this new environment which we are exploring.

Mr. HERMAN. But, sir, our program so far seems to me to depend entirely upon military hardware. Is it going to continue to do so?

Dr. GLENNAN. I think so far as the boosters are concerned, there are the devices used to get these satellites into orbit, to get them up through the atmosphere and out into space. We will continue to depend upon the military for hardware and for the teams which handle the launching procedures.

Mr. CRONKITE. The Atlas is a piece of military hardware, a rocket designed to become a weapon, after it has passed dozens of ground tests like this, dozens of other tests in the air. Only then will the Atlas become an intercontinental ballistic missile, the basis of our space-age military policy. We will not attack first; so we must have weapons capable of retaliating against attack. That is our defense, our power to deter an aggressor. But the Atlas is not a weapon yet. For the last 4 months, CBS newsmen have been taking inventory of our defenses, to find out what we have now in the way of ready military strength, how far along we've come toward developing our rockets into retaliatory power. Here is George Herman's report:

Mr. HERMAN. Our first big missile is ready to take on fully operational status. These are Thors, 1,500-mile missiles stockpiled in production line numbers at Santa Monica, Calif. And they are bound for bases overseas within range of aggressor nations. Under the supervision of Maj. Gen. Bernard Schriever, head of the Air Force Ballistic Missile Division, the Thor has gone through research and development into production and shipment to our allies for use by their own air forces. These particular Thors are ready to be wheeled out of this warehouse to an airstrip right on the plant grounds and flown to places where they are needed. But good though the Thor may be, intermediate range missile has certain strategic limitations. Even though our Thor bases have yet to go wholly operational, the intercontinental missile based in the United States has already been designated to take over the Thors or part of its job. As of right now, however, the Thor is the only ballistic missile ready to go, so I asked General Schriever for a progress report on our Thor bases in Britain.

General SCHRIEVER. Progress is very good; we're right on schedule. Of course, the initial element of the first squadron will be on a training status, but it could fire if it had to.

Mr. HERMAN. When will it be fully ready?

General SCHRIEVER. The first squadron will be fully ready in February.

Mr. HERMAN. General, is this an accelerated schedule speeded up after sputnik and the Russian ICBM?

General SCHRIEVER. Yes; it certainly is. The Thor program is actually in being less than 3 years. In the fall of 1957 there was a tendency to slow things down, but after sputnik we did accelerate. As a matter of fact, we are putting our first missiles overseas wholly a year before we thought we could in the fall of 1957.

Mr. HERMAN. Well, General Schriever, critics both in the United States and overseas have been saying that the Thor has an unfortunate history of blowing up on the test stand. Just how reliable are these missiles which we are now shipping overseas to our friends and our allies?

General SCHRIEVER. Of course, we expect to have a few missiles blow up on the stand. If we didn't we wouldn't need a research and development program. Actually we fired some 25 missiles at Cape Canaveral. We had three that we lost in that manner. We expect that the initial operational missiles will be about 50 percent reliable—reliability is a factor of the missile and training of personnel as well. I think we can go as high as perhaps 80 or 90 percent within a year.

Mr. HERMAN. What is the mission of the IRBM if war should come?

General SCHRIEVER. The mission would be to move in and provide an earlier strike against the enemy which I think would be very helpful to our strategic bomber force which is going to continue to be for some time the backbone of our deterrent capability.

Mr. HERMAN. Well, now sir, we have been publicizing to the world for some time that we're going to sent these IRBM's overseas. What is Russia's answer to our IRBM threat?

General SCHRIEVER. Well, of course, they have been developing missiles that would cover Europe long before we started our IRBM program; they have an operational capability now.

Mr. HERMAN. Well, sir, when can we expect to have some ICBM bases in operation, bases capable of striking the enemy with missiles launched from our own home soil?

General SCHRIEVER. Well, our initial capability will be available in May of 1959.

Mr. HERMAN. What about the so-called gap; is Russia increasing her lead over us, or are we catching up?

General SCHRIEVER. Ah, in the ballistic missile area, I think we have been losing as rapidly as it is possible to lose from a technological standpoint. I doubt very seriously whether the Russians are moving any faster than we are at the present time; I do believe that, and I know, in fact, that they started sooner and our biggest problem is that we started a little bit too late. If we continue to apply the resources and the effort into our program that we have in the past 2 years, I think that you can say that we probably will have reached a point or will reach a point where the missiles are to some extent in a stalemate condition.

Mr. HERMAN. But right now the missile burden rests on Thor. And in order to get within striking range, Thor must be flown across the Atlantic to bases on the soil of our NATO allies. The Russians tried to prevent this with a tirade of threats to allied governments. Then they began to work on zeroing in their own IRBM's on potential allied missile bases. So far, the only NATO ally which has accepted a Thor squadron for its own forces is Britain.

The route of the Thor through Britain to the Royal Air Force bases which will use them has been marked by controversies. Some Britains fear Thor because it uses tricky and potentially explosive fuel. They fear destructive accidents. Others complain because it takes minutes to crank up and fire a Thor in time of call and because it stands exposed and because ground vulnerable to attack by enemy missiles only 8 minutes flying time away.

The truth is that Thor is designed to be fired in 15 minutes' notice from a cold standing start. Much less in time of emergency. But so far there is no radar network in Europe capable of detecting enemy ballistic missiles on the way; none under construction. So Thor is a counterpunch system with neither a warning network nor underground protection against enemy attack. So how about a counterpuncher deterrent system based on our own soil? General Schriever says the first Atlas base will be ready in the middle of this year—six months from now. More than a year behind the Atlas is the Titon missile designed to be hidden underground and reinforced concrete pits ready to emerge safe even after a major enemy blow has landed. And a year or more behind that is the solid fueled minuteman—small, cheap, easy to protect, easy to fire at a moment's notice. But it may be delayed. The Defense Department is withholding approved funds for the equipment needed to aim and fire Minuteman until the missile proves itself. The Russians for their part test flew a fuel-range intercontinental missile 18 months before we did, and assuredly they have had ICBM bases operational and aimed at us for some months now. For 2 years at least we will have no radar warning system against enemy missiles. Our BMEWS or ballistic missile early warning system will not be ready until 1961 at the very earliest. A report on what the Navy is planning in seaborn missiles after a word from Bill Shipley.

Mr. HERMAN. The problem of protecting our counterpunch from surprise attack has been approached in a different way by the United States Navy. They see this as the answer—missile bases which move from place to place and fire from secret and protected depths of the sea; nuclear powered submarines, armed with Polaris missiles, each capable of carrying a thermonuclear warhead 1,500 miles. A navigation system evolved from that of the defunct Navajo missile will locate the submarine even under the Arctic ice like the Nautilus or the Skate, or completing record underwater runs like the Seawolf, right at the dock in New London, Conn. The Seawolf has proved that a nuclear-powered submarine can stay under water months at a time, keeping her missile power always hidden, always ready for instant firing. If Seawolf were a Polaris submarine the missiles would stand in firing tubes under here ready to be fired from deep under water. Actually, below this deck waiting for us is Rear Adm. John T. Hayward, the Navy's Chief of Research and Development. In the control room of the Seawolf I asked Admiral Hayward whether there was a single Polaris missile in existence anywhere today.

Admiral HAYWARD. The answer to that must be "No." We have quite an elaborate and complex system that we're working on, and we have quite a few test vehicles that we have fired. In order to put an elaborate system like this together, it's a step-by-step process. You don't wait to have all system components working before you test. We hope to continue our test firings, to continue these test vehicles for the various components; but as of today it does not exist.

Mr. HERMAN. Well, when will there be Polarises in existence ready to go if the need should arise?

Admiral HAYWARD. The operational date for the Polaris system is 1960.

Mr. HERMAN. That means in about a year and a half from today?

Admiral HAYWARD. That is correct.

Mr. HERMAN. When the Polarises are in existence, the submarines are ready to take them out when the whole system is in evidence and ready to use, how big a force will it be?

Admiral HAYWARD. We are presently authorized to construct five nuclear submarines. We were authorized or funds were appropriated in Congress for nine submarines. The President decided that we would only expend the funds for five submarines.

Mr. HERMAN. Well, do we know what the Russians have in the line of a similar kind of submarine base intermediate range missiles?

Admiral HAYWARD. Well, in the Reds' Star, which is a publication organ for the Soviet fleet, has come out with statements that they are putting missiles aboard their submarines as intermediate range missiles.

Mr. HERMAN. How many submarines do you think they could throw against us, submarines armed with ballistic missiles?

Admiral HAYWARD. There is no reason why they couldn't put as many as a hundred if they wanted to. There is nothing to stop them from doing it.

Mr. HERMAN. If they were to disperse their submarines in the Atlantic, would we have the forces and the ability to track them all down?

Admiral HAYWARD. Approximately in this case geography favors the free world, because the Russian submarines have to come out through narrow entrances; for instance, the Denmark Straits; the Skagerrak; Straits of Gibraltar; and the Bosporus Sea.

Mr. HERMAN. What are our detection chances there?

Admiral HAYWARD. Well, they are very good. Particularly, with the conventional type submarine, which requires its snorkel to recharge, because that particular noise and that particular submarine is very susceptible to our detection devices. However, the peace-diving nuclear submarine is a different craft. The Navy's No. 1 task, really today in the general war situation, is the defeat of a submarine carrying missiles against our country. We feel very strongly that the flanks of the United States should be protected against this attack as well as the northern part of the continent. We do not have, however, the forces to go and investigate every contact if they really flood the defenses with lots of submarines.

Mr. HERMAN. Just last week the Navy decided presumably with administration blessing to build the 4 additional submarines authorized by Congress—there will be giant vessels, like the others designed to carry at least 16 Polaris missiles apiece. The United States is a nonaggressor nation. Our goal is stalemate. And thermonuclear stalemate is not easy, either to achieve or to maintain. Any sensible enemy will continually examine all facets of our defense for some weak points. Submarine warfare, missile and antimissile technology, even civil defense; for experts insist that with a good civil defense we could survive a thermonuclear blow and hit back. Even when we have temporarily achieved a condition of stalemate, we cannot rest. A new threat looms up; the threat of limited war. In the halls of the Pentagon, limited war is defined as a conflict in which American forces are not directly opposed to Russian forces. It is not limited to conventional weapons. But it is expected that one old-fashioned weapon, the foot soldier, will still play the major role in limited war. With the other services occupied mainly in transporting, supplying, and supporting him. And in ground forces, here is where we stand. And one of our divisions will soon be missing—a casualty of the budget. Now how effective are our limited forces? We took this question to a commander experienced in both all-out and limited war. A former Army Chief of Staff, a former Allied commander in Korea and in Europe, Gen. Matthew B. Ridgway. At his home in Pittsburgh I asked him what kind of war the United States must be prepared to fight?

General RIDGWAY. Any kind of war, Mr. Herman, from the smallest so-called brush-fire type to all-out war. Even the smallest brush-fire type war contains within itself the possibility, no matter where it occurs, of rapid development into all-out war everywhere. And the intentions of our openly declared enemies, repeatedly stated, is the ultimate conquest of western civilization. It is for this reason that we must win any war we enter, for it would be a war of survival.

Mr. HERMAN. Now General Ridgway, how about the cost of keeping prepared for all these different kinds of war? Can we afford it?

General RIDGWAY. I am glad you asked that question. I have here a pamphlet issued last August by the Committee for Economic Development. It is, I think, a very impressive one, and I should like to read you two brief paragraphs.

"Periodically the timid suggestion comes from many quarters that high expenditures for national defense might lead the country to economic stagnation or collapse.

"A realistic appraisal of the situation shows that this fear has been greatly exaggerated. The truth of the matter is that the American people will have to decide for themselves what they think security is worth. But they can afford whatever has to be spent in the cause of national defense."

And this last significant sentence was put in italics by the Committee. Now in my own experience in Washington, I frequently found occasions where the national defense was subordinated to the economic factor, and that is why, I think, that this particular quotation is pertinent to this particular interview.

Mr. HERMAN. General Ridgway, we hear a great deal of discussion about limited warfare. Aren't we virtually committed to the use of at least tactical atomic weapons today?

General RIDGWAY. Unquestionably so. The loss of even a small brush-fire war would be another severe blow to an already damaged reputation of the United States throughout the world—not to mention our casualty lists. First, we are certain to be faced with vastly superior numbers in any future war in which we may engage, and these weapons will go far to eliminating or at least cutting down on this disparity. And second, we will shortly have fractional atomic weapons entering our arsenals and available for operational use. As these come into our hands, they will imperceptibly merge with the conventional type of weapon. From my own combat experience, I can clearly recall many situations where, had a small atomic weapon such, for example, as an atomic bazooka been used, it could have brought instant local success, and with a consequent saving of many American lives.

Mr. HERMAN. Do we have a mobile combat force capable of being rushed to the scene?

General RIDGWAY. Yes, we have some forces with the requisite degree of readiness to move quickly to meet one very small war * * * or one limited war, you might say. The basic question in mind is, in view of our worldwide commitments to allies who ring the earth, do we have a ready force of adequate strength of instant readiness and the transportation to move it quickly when the alarm bell rings? And my answer to that question would be an emphatic "No."

Mr. HERMAN. On the subject of space and defense then, here are the conclusions drawn by CBS News: The dramatic news of Russia's huge moon probe has reemphasized the fact, temporarily obscured—that Russia is still far ahead of us in the development of heavy-power rockets. In our own space work we appear to have proceeded in a series of brilliant improvisations, but with no national program. In the weapon system race, sputnik caused a major speedup. Our Atlas is ahead of the dangerously slowed-down schedule of 1957, but it is only on time according to the original schedule of 1954. We are developing strong weapons of retaliation but no radar system to put them into effect by detecting enemy missiles approaching in a surprise attack. And such a detection system is at least 2 years off. A high Pentagon official says we are not working at it as fast as we could. CBS News found that most experts in the missile field believe our effort can be greatly accelerated. They say we are not going full speed ahead, especially in our space program. And the advance hints on the new budget are widely taken to mean that we do not plan to go full steam ahead. Every defense contractor, almost every military official, told CBS News that our progress was dramatic but spotty and incomplete. They all felt we could go faster and almost without exception they said they were prepared to go faster—if orders come down from the President.

WEAK BUDGET POSITION—ADMINISTRATION SAID TO HANDICAP ITSELF

(By Roscoe Drummond)

In an understandable effort to hold the line against lighthearted spending, President Eisenhower is taking a stand at the very opening of the new session which, it seems to me, weakens his position in Congress and in the country.

What the President has done is to talk early and long and almost exclusively about a balanced budget and about the danger of the wild spenders.

The effect of all this talk is for Mr. Eisenhower to link himself almost inextricably with the idea that balancing the budget is the first priority, the No. 1 objective of the Government.

In the midst of the perilous Berlin crisis, the uncertainties in the Middle East, the uneasy truce over Quemoy and Matsu, in the face of 17 limited wars during the past 13 years, the majority in Congress, including many Republicans, are certainly convinced:

That mustering the total resources needed to wage the peace is the first priority, the No. 1 objective of the Government.

That balancing the budget cannot be put ahead of keeping the balance of power in scientific weapons from slipping menacingly into the hands of the Soviets.

That we are not dealing with a peacetime budget, but with a cold wartime budget, and that while a balanced budget would be most welcome, it is not the first requirement of national survival in the kind of world we are living in today.

The consequences of the President approaching Congress with the main banner in his hand reading "Balance the budget" will, I think, be these:

1. It will make it harder for the White House to get from Congress some of the urgent appropriations it is seeking. When foreign aid comes up, the President has almost invited its opponents to cut it and say virtuously: "Here's where we'll help the White House balance the budget."

2. It will divide the Republican Party because at least half of the Republicans in the Senate want to put meeting the Nation's needs ahead of balancing the budget if both are not simultaneously attainable.

3. It leaves to the Democratic leaders in Congress a wide opportunity for initiative in meeting the present and oncoming challenges from the Kremlin in new weapons and in new explorations of outer space.

After the briefing of the congressional leaders at the White House this week, Senator LYNDON JOHNSON of Texas showed that this is exactly what he intends to do when he remarked, "I am rather disappointed that we are not going farther and faster in our military preparations and space programs."

It is, it seems to me, a mistake and a misuse of the term to try to win an argument on balancing the budget by calling those who would spend more, rather than less, for the vital needs of the Nation, radicals. Senator JOHNSON is no radical. Senator JOHN S. COOPER, of Kentucky, is no radical.

I suspect we need a new and relevant definition of a conservative and I venture the following:

A 20th-century conservative is one who is determined to deal with the Nation's problems on conservative principles—but not to neglect them. Too often in the past it has been the conservative who has used his conservatism as an excuse for not doing what is needed. That's not conservatism. That's neglect.

The businessmen's Committee for Economic Development warns that "we must not hobble ourselves with the notion that there is some arbitrary limit" on what we can safely spend for defense.

The nongovernmental National Planning Association warns that to seek a balanced budget at the expense of military strength "may prove a prelude to disaster."

I am not arguing for an unbalanced budget; far from it. I am only saying that the first objective is to determine what we need to do in a period of no peace and no sign of peace. And then, in the American tradition, find the way to do it.

SECOND UNITED NATIONS INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE ON PEACEFUL USES OF ATOMIC ENERGY

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I should like to submit some personal observations on implications of the Second United Nations International Conference on the Peaceful Uses of Atomic Energy held at Geneva, Switzerland, last summer. As a member of the delegation serving as observers for the Congress of the United States, I had a special interest in the exhibits, the scientific papers, and the discussions relating to the use of nuclear energy for generating electric power.

The district which I represent is an important producer of bituminous coal. As you know, coal generates more electricity than all other sources of energy combined. The railroad industry, which relies upon coal traffic for a substantial portion of its revenue, is an employer upon which many thousands of our men, women, and children depend for subsistence. Greensburg, the county seat of Westmoreland County, is now headquarters for the West Penn Power Co., whose annual consumption of coal is in excess of 2 million tons. More than that, many Westmoreland County residents are engaged in the manufacture of generating units and other electrical equipment. The Ellicott Co., one of whose plants is located in my hometown, ships these finished products to utilities throughout the land. A large number of our employees at Westinghouse are similarly occupied. Chairman of the Board Gwilym A. Price said this week in a year-end statement that order backlogs for atomic equipment last year were 30 percent higher than at the end of 1957, and he expects the atomic power business to continue growing in 1959 for the fifth consecutive year.

Whether electricity is to come from coal or the atom or from hydrogen will still require the manufacture of turbines and generators. Thus all Westmoreland County has a very decided interest in the future of electric utilities. Furthermore, as consumers of electricity in home and industry, we are in support of whatever progress can be achieved in increasing the efficiency of electric power generation, if only for the sake of rate stability.

What American scientists and engineers have accomplished in the field of atomic electric power impressed everyone who attended the Geneva conference. The Westinghouse Corporation displayed working models of reactors. There was perhaps $10 million worth of nuclear equipment at hand in the United States exhibit, while the Russian display consisted largely of plastic models and nothing of an operating nature. The conference demonstrated the potential of nuclear energy for power, heat, agriculture, transportation, mining, manufacturing and medical research.

Geneva was an excellent setting for the conference, Mr. Speaker. It is within close proximity of Western Europe's bustling industrial centers whose fuel-hungry plants and factors have been demanding more coal than native mines are able to supply. Indeed, many hundreds of tons of coal and coke from Westmoreland County's mines and ovens have been shipped to Western Europe in recent years. I think perhaps a brief look at the history of the coal industries here and in Europe will give us a better understanding as to why there is such a contrast in the prospects for atomic electric power in the two continents.

That Western Pennsylvania was one of nature's storehouses of rich coal reserves was coming to be recognized two centuries ago. It was in 1759 that Colonel Mercer, in command of Fort Pitt, reported the presence of rich coal reserves and prompted an official expedition for the most readily accessible seams. The presence of coal in Westmoreland County was evident at least since 1767, at which time the officer in charge of Fort Ligonier gave a resident permission to "cultivate" 200 acres of coal land.

From those earliest records to the present time more than 8 billion tons of bituminous coal have been produced in my State. Yet 35 billion tons—more than 4 times the total extracted in a 200-year period—of recoverable reserves remain in the ground in central and western Pennsylvania. For the United States as a whole, the alltime production figure is nearing the 29-billion-ton level, but minable reserves still amount to 947 billion tons. It is also interesting to note that there is considerably more anthracite in Pennsylvania's hard coal region than the 5 billion tons mined thus far.

For Europe, the situation is quite different. It is true that Great Britain alone has an estimated 180-billion-ton coal reserve and that the continental territory west of the Iron Curtain may contain another 150 billion tons, but so much of this coal is difficult to mine that there is no likelihood of supply meeting demand in the foreseeable future.

Great Britain was a traditional exporter of coal for centuries. Probably the world's first instance of coal exportation took place in 1362 when a ship from France brought a cargo of corn from Newcastle and returned with a load of coal. A monopoly in the coal export trade was eventually established by the British. By 1913, the last pre-World War I year, 82 million tons of coal left British docks for ports in other countries. The peak year was in 1923 with 90 million tons moving abroad. With Germany also able to produce more coal than was required for her own consumption, Europe never faced a coal shortage except in periods of work stoppages or as the result of ravages of war.

The first substantial shipments of U.S. coal to Europe followed World War II as the battered nations across the Atlantic struggled to restore their own industrial output. By 1950 a semblance of economic order had been restored and Europe's total imports from American mines amounted to less than 1 million tons. Since that time the requisitions have oscillated considerably, with a peak of almost 50 million tons transiting the Atlantic in 1957. In the year just closed Europe's imports were in the neighborhood of 34 million tons.

Whether that market will adjust itself in the coming years is problematical, although most fuel experts are of the opinion that there will be no further periods of drastic flexibility. Europe's industrial activity continues to rise. Population moves upward. Standards of living are scheduled to improve despite austerity programs such as that recently made necessary in France. Thus energy consumption can move only one way—upward.

Here atomic electric power enters the picture. To augment the supply of domestic and imported coal and oil, nuclear power may soon come into economic usefulness in Europe. Whether this development will ever decrease the cost of electricity on the continent and in the United Kingdom is uncertain, but—as research and development progress—it is possible that a decrease in the cost of nuclear energy will meet an increased cost of the conventional power produced by coal and oil. Europe, therefore, has a decided immediate interest in the atomic electric power program.

In the United States, any private investment in commercial atomic power generation in the near future will have to be inspired more by long-range hopes and job service motives than by any reasonable expectation of substantial early profit. This appraisal is explained in detail by Dr. Robert E. Wilson, a member of the general advisory committee to the U.S. Atomic Energy Commission, in the January issue of Power Industry magazine. The following excerpts are from his article:

When we start to talk about the possible use of nuclear fuels in central power stations, I think it is fair to describe the present situation as confused. It is confused partly because of misunderstandings on the part of the public and partly because even the experts hold varying opinions, though not as varied as some published reports would indicate.

According to one published claim, a plant in California will be able to make electricity in 1962 for less than 9 mills per kilowatt-hour. Another estimate predicts nuclear power costs by 1980 as low as 2 mills.

On the other hand, electricity from the plant in Shippingport, Pa.—the only large plant in actual operation—has been said to cost 64 mills.

The mere cost of fabricating the fuel elements—one factor often overlooked in the past—was about twice the cost of conventional power.

For large conventional steam powerplants today, the cost range is around 3.5 to 8 mills, depending on size and location.

Mr. Willard Owens, associate counsel of the United Mine Workers of America, contributed a most illuminating article on the United Nations Conference in the November 1 issue of the United Mine Workers Journal. He suggested that the rate of introduction of atomic-electric power in each country will be dictated by two factors: First, a lack of conventional fuel rather than competition with available conventional fuel, and second, a demand for large blocks of power. He foresees the development of atomic power programs first in England, the Continent of Europe and—somewhat later—in Japan. He also foresees early use of the peaceful atom in India, whose population is rising rapidly and where coal deposits are far away from points of heavy power needs.

Mr. Tom Pickett, executive vice president of the National Coal Association, is on record as endorsing the orderly development of the peaceful atom, both in America and in Europe, as a necessary step to scientific and industrial progress throughout the world. Mr. Pickett points out, however, that there is enough available coal reserves in this country to last for 500 years even if the current rate of production were doubled.

Our abundant reserves are but one reason why the coal industry need have no fear of competition from the atom in the foreseeable future. Our modern mines have been mechanized to such an extent that we can produce about four times more coal per man-day than can any other country. We have the manpower necessary to operate the intricate mining equipment. Given the incentive to invest in new properties and to plan for continued mechanization, the coal industry will have ample capacity to provide the energy for the growing electric-utility market, the oversea requirements, and the variety of domestic consumers that include retail coalyards, the chemical industry, and miscellaneous plants and factories.

As expressed by both the National Coal Association and the United Mine Workers of America, the coal industry favors research and development that may be carried on in the field of atomic electric power. We who come from coal areas are, however, concerned with programs that would project the Government into the business of producing electric power through the atom. We stand in support of research activity that will enable us to make maximum use of nuclear fission and hydrogen for peacetime application. We oppose subsidized competition of any nature. I am confident that Congress will follow such a course in the ensuing years.

AMEND SOCIAL SECURITY ACT

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, I am filing a bill today to amend title II of the Social Security Act so as to remove the limitation upon the amount of outside income which may be received by an individual while receiving benefits.

I feel that the present limitation of $1,200 in outside earnings is unrealistic. The economic problems of retired workers receiving social security payments are becoming increasingly apparent. Congress last year increased social security benefits by 7 percent, and these higher benefits will be reflected in the checks to be sent out to recipients at the end of this month. However, because of inflation even the increased payments will not be sufficient to meet the minimum needs of these retired workers and their dependents.

Many older men and women are forced into supplemental, part-time employment to augment their social security payments in an attempt to maintain even the barest minimum living standard. These people have written to me about their problem and many have come into my district office in Springfield to explain in detail the difficulty they experience in trying to get along on social security payments and the $1,200 outside earnings limit. These older persons are still useful citizens of our community and have much to contribute to business and industry, even if only on a part-time basis. I certainly hope that my colleagues on the Ways and Means Committee will consider removing the $1,200 ceiling, or at least compromise the issue by increasing the ceiling to $2,000 a year. Such a change in the law will not cost the Federal Government 1 cent and will help greatly the older citizens.

INCREASE IN SOCIAL SECURITY BENEFITS

Mr. BOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOW. Mr. Speaker, it has recently come to my attention that some inequities have been brought about by the increase in social security benefits.

I have received a communication from a constituent of mine who has been on a World War I pension. In 1955 he lost his right leg and developed hardening of the arteries. He is presently in a wheelchair and requires constant attention.

Under the new social security law in which we increased the benefits by 7 percent, that increase put my constituent $34 over the $2,700 limitation as provided for in the Veterans Benefits Act. This has caused the Veterans' Administration to withdraw the pension from this unfortunate individual so that instead of giving this man an increase, he has had a substantial loss in his income.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the Veterans' Affairs Committee, together with the Ways and Means Committee, will bring legislation to the floor to correct this situation, and that the Congress will take prompt action.

I am sure it was not the intent of this House, or of the Congress, to work this hardship upon deserving people.

EUROPEAN COMMON MARKET

Mr. MUMMA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. MUMMA. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD, I wish to include an article by Mr. Frank Masland, Jr., entitled "European Common Market."

Mr. Masland, as you may know, is of the Masland Co. in Carlisle, Pa., weavers of fine rugs and broadloom carpets.

His article sets forth his reflections on the subject and will evoke the careful thinking of those who read it.

Mr. Speaker, Mr. Masland's article follows herewith:

EUROPEAN COMMON MARKET

(By Frank E. Masland, Jr.)

I have written a number of articles in which I have attempted to make the point that if the United States persists in pursuing its present policies with respect to tariffs, protection of American jobs in general and underwriting of jobs abroad, the impact upon industry and employment within the confines of the United States will be serious and conceivably disastrous.

I have contended there is no evidence justifying the long held myth of superior Yankee ingenuity, of American technological supremacy.

It has been my contention that the American standard is where it is for a number of reasons, none of which provide evidence that the American is a superman in the factory or the market.

To begin with we started with vast open spaces, unlimited natural resources, and a domestic market that quantitatively could be expanded or contracted at will through the unlimited reservoir of Ellis Island.

We were and are a new nation. We started with freedom as a cornerstone and those who envisioned the future protected that freedom with measures that were inviolate until the results of that freedom created a society so satiated and concerned for the moment that it traded the fact of freedom for the promise of security.

The freedom of the individual begat the free enterprise system, and the free enterprise system begat the concept of mass production, and mass production begat the highest standard of living the world has known, and that standard of living begat complacency, and complacency begat a labor government, and the labor government begat socialism and socialism took the place of free enterprise. And with the loss of free enterprise went the loss of individual freedom.

The pinnacle of this cycle lay in the concept, the development, and the full utilization of the mass production system by free men and women. That system reduced costs, increased wages, resulted in keen competition, stimulated sales effort, built a market.

At a time in our history when we no longer possess national fervor, when we have traded sturdy individualism for state security, when we have traded imaginative constructive conservatism for those panaceas that the yellow pages of history record as having been tried and found wanting, at that period of our history we find that Europe, we so long ago left so far behind, recognizing that which our history proved would work and adopting it for themselves and adapting it to their purposes.

We were in a position to make a choice—private jobs or public jobs. We seem to have made our choice. Public jobs are increasing at a far faster rate than private jobs. Private employment is completely dependent upon the ability of private industry to compete for whatever markets may be necessary. Today we find Europe taking momentous steps designed to create a market for its products. No one can find fault with their objective. Perhaps no one should find fault with their methods. Certainly they are the methods we used. The tools they will employ are mass production and protective tariffs.

Germany, the Benelux group, France, and Italy have created that to which they refer as the European Common Market. Their efforts and their objectives have been cheered and furthered by the Government of the United States. Their purpose is to expand capital investment and industrial capacity within the area of the member nations, to provide employment, raise the standard of living, and create a market. I find no fault with such ambitions or with their collaborative effort. I wonder, however, how it is that we here in the States can view this movement with such equanimity. Certainly we have read what has been written. Or have we? Perhaps, as we have done with Stalin and Mao and Khrushchev, we either fail to read or disbelieve. For those who put the European Common Market together and who are administering it have set forth their thinking with respect to it, and it makes interesting and perhaps apprehensive reading for those who provide jobs and those who depend upon jobs in the States.

For the justification of my opinion that apprehension is warranted I quote from the writings of these gentlemen. I quote out of context. There is no other way I can do it, but I will attempt to quote as fairly as may be possible.

First, may I quote from Baron Rene Boel, president of the European League for Economic Cooperation. He is a Belgian. "The common market will lead to a vigorous economic expansion. This internal expansion will in itself lead to an increase in foreign trade. Europe will have to import increased quantities of raw materials and capital equipment, in exchange for which, it will supply increased quantities of finished and semifinished products. In addition, the prices of these products will be lowered, thanks to the rationalizing of the European economy, working increasingly in terms of mass production." Baron Boel adds, "The United States, the United Kingdom, and the commonwealth will be among the beneficiaries"—but he does not say how. He leaves that hanging in air. He believes the market will be of such size that it will allow enterprises of other countries to establish large plants in Europe. Perhaps this is the way in which he believes the United States will benefit, by foreign investment, by building plants in Europe. What does that mean? It means that capital which otherwise would be used for expansion and new jobs here at home will be used for the building of large plants in Europe providing jobs for European workmen at the expense of the American workmen.

Baron Pierre Bonvoisin, chairman of the board of the Banque de la Societe Generale de Belgique, also a Belgian, states that the European common market will "bring about the development of the European bloc which can speak effectively to its world partners"—a European bloc versus an American bloc?—there is no such thing. Our laws forbid it.

Baron Bonvoisin goes on to say, "The criticisms and fears aroused by the common external tariff call for a clarification." He states, "This tariff does not have to be rigidly applied; a list of customs exceptions has been provided for, thus limiting tariff protection. The possibility of obtaining a tariff quota suggests that the sources of supply will not be completely upset."

The Baron clearly recognizes that a protective tariff is a tool that may be used for the protection of those within the European Common Market.

The Baron concludes that "American industrialists will have to make a choice between setting up factories in Europe, absorbing existing concerns, or simply participating in European enterprises, or transferring patents and licenses to Europe."

Raymond Aron, French author, journalist, and economist, professor at the Sorbonne, states that "The Common Market was set up for the benefit of its six members and not that of the Western bloc in general." He also says, "It is impossible to set up a new economic unity without some prejudice to outsiders."

Pierre Dreyfus, president and managing director of the Regie Renault of France, expresses his belief that "The Common Market is a new and efficient step towards the creation of a vast economic area which will permit an exploitation of modern techniques, a genuine expansion of exchange possibilities for goods and capital as well as the free travel of citizens—the community goes beyond a simple customs union: It is a constant progression towards economic integration." He adds, "In addition, the countries consider the General Agreement for Tariff and Trade as a point of departure for further tariff reductions to be carried out by negotiations with their partners in world trade."

Pierre Dreyfus quotes M. Hallstein as stating that "the six members have had to pay what might be called an entrance fee—a partial renunciation of national sovereignty in favor of common interest and institutions, an application of jointly decided prices." Jointly decided prices are a privilege that our laws deny capital invested in American industry but not American capital invested in European industry.

Mr. Dreyfus goes on to say, "Nonmembers benefit from the Common Market by increasing their investments in their common area. For this reason it can be hoped that the Common Market will attract foreign capital in the same way that the United Kingdom attracted American investments."

Ernst Falkenheim, member of the economic and social committee of the European Economic Community and their chairman, offers this advice to American businessmen, "If I were an American businessman, I should not hesitate to invest both in the countries of the Common Market and in those of the European free trade area because the chances of an economic boom are the same for both areas."

Rear Adm. E. H. Shattock, representing Great Britain (not a Euratom member) states, "This expansion of the market will run parallel to the present intense drive for increased product activity." Another indication of the determination of the European market to achieve through the medium of mass production and modern technology a high element of productive efficiency, an objective to be respected but a factor with which we, in America, will have to contend.

Admiral Shattock states, "The countries outside the area will have to face the common tariff of the Common Market and, in competition with goods passing between the six free of all duties, cannot but lose a substantial proportion of their markets."

I again quote from Admiral Shattock, "In the Common Market, any negotiations with third countries will have to be made by the six as a body. This will necessitate, of course, preagreements between the Common Market countries and will considerably enhance their bargaining power."

I will conclude with Admiral Shattock by quoting his confirmation of what seems to be a general conclusion. He states, "The difficulties that this free market will bring to American exports will be tackled with typical American energy and enterprise and mainly by a considerable expansion of investment in the area."

A. R. Smith, head of the intelligence department of the Imperial Chemical Industries believes that the European Economic Community could lead to a stronger and more united Western Europe. This would bring benefits to the Western World. But, Mr. Smith also states, "Nevertheless, within the six member countries there are strongly restrictive and protectionist forces. At the moment it is difficult to say which will become uppermost."

Gerard F. Bauer of Switzerland is of the opinion the Common Market will make it possible for such industrial sciences as automation and nuclearization to make further progress according to a rational scheme. Prices will go down and popular purchasing power up.

Bear in mind that products made in America currently face difficulty in meeting prices of products made abroad. It is obvious that with the use of industrial sciences, automation, and nuclearization, unless European wages are as high as American wages, as Mr. Bauer states, "prices will go down" and it will be even more difficult for American manufacturers to compete with foreign-made goods.

Mr. Bauer adds, "As to the motives of American businessmen, it is both true that they expect a higher sales potential from a widened European Market and that they fear that this Market might be closed to goods manufactured outside Europe. These two arguments are quite equivalent." He goes on to say, "It it quite conceivable that the American Government will favor the private investments in Europe and help these interests through the institutions in which it plays a determining role." Mr. Bauer is very realistic. There is little question but that the American Government, if it continues to pursue its present philosophy, will utilize every means to achieve the investment of American dollars abroad.

I would like to suggest that the only American bloc analogous to the European bloc would be one consisting of North and South America joined in an American Common Market and in which dollars could be invested for the development of a market that in the future will be of more importance to the United States than dollars invested in a European economy which for some years has been moving along at a clip, at least equal to that experienced in the United States.

Mr. Lincoln Gordon, professor of international economic relations, Harvard University, has an interesting comment to offer. He states, "American business interests would vary according to industry. Larger exports should accrue especially to American agriculture, engineering, chemical, and consumer goods industries would plan for greater European investment, both because of their weakened competitive position in exporting from the United States and because of the 'more challenging investment opportunities within the new markets.'"

There we have the case. What does it portend, and what do we do about it? What it portends has been clearly set forth. A vastly greater percentage of available American capital will be invested in the European Common Market area. It will be invested abroad for only one reason—because invested capital abroad can undersell invested capital at home. Obviously, larger investments abroad will result in a greater volume of merchandise seeking the American market. What will be the result of dollars going abroad and goods coming back? Without a protective tariff American industry will have increasingly tough sledding. We are faced with a population explosion. We will need a job explosion. We won't get it from American dollars spent abroad and European goods sold in our home markets. There are those who estimate that by 1965 we will have a frozen unemployed norm of 10 percent of the working force or 10 million. Ten million unemployed supported by those who are employed. This does not take into consideration such additional unemployment as may result from an increase in the movement of United States capital abroad and the movement of finished goods back home. What is the answer? It is a double-barreled one. Adequate protection for American industry, which is simply another way of saying adequate protection for the jobs of American workers, and the development of the American common market, the market from Alaska to Tierra del Fuego. If, in 2,050 A.D., the population of the United States is as predicted—800 million—we will need that market and need it badly.

One recognizes, of course, that the major threat to the so-called free world is communism.

Europe needs to develop a market and raise its standard of living. In the overall, the Euratom nations do not lack capital. Germany alone could provide all that is needed. The United States needs to protect its industrial potential. In 2 world wars it is all that stood between Western World victory and defeat. Currently, it is all that stands between Western World economic victory and defeat. In the event of any crises anywhere, its unimpaired potential is a factor belligerent nations respect.

Communism threatens on all fronts. We are concerned here with the European front and the home front. A self-financed Euratom can confront the European threat. The threat is equally great in South and Central America. A United States financed "Common Market" is the most effective answer to that threat. If there is excess U.S. capital it is there that it should be invested. I first advocated such a policy in an article written in 1949. Therein I said, "We should join with the New World for mutual defense and the development of a market. If we do not, one of these days we may be forced to fight for 'lebensraum.'" While as a Nation we are faced with ideological and political infiltration and economic strangulation, this article is concerned with the economic aspect only.

There may someday be a Common World Market. It is Utopia. Before that comes to pass there may well be an Asian Market (China, Japan, India, Indonesia, Philippines, Russia) dominated by China—a European Market (Germany, France, England, Spain, Benelux) with Germany the leading figure—and an American Market (Alaska to Tierra del Fuego). It behooves us to put forth every effort to develop that market and to protect our industrial potential and our domestic jobs in the meantime.

UNITED STATES TURNS DOWN AIR FORCE PLAN FOR INCREASING ICBM FORCE

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, following my remarks I am placing in the RECORD an article that appeared on page 2A of the January 9, 1959, St. Louis Post-Dispatch under the following headlines: "United States Turns Down Air Force Plan for Increasing ICBM Force—Budget Is Said To Provide for Only 130 Missiles by 1962—Russia Could Have 500 to 1,000 by Then." This article was under the byline of Richard Witkin, New York Times Service.

I read this article to see just who had made these statements which if true, of course, are very important to our country and to Members of this Congress who have been elected to study the problems of our defense and act upon what we find from our studies.

The basis for this news story is regrettably the basis for many such stories that have appeared over a period of years which have involved similar matters serious to the welfare of the United States and which all too frequently upon checking disappear into outer space.

I set out the authorities used by Mr. Witkin for his bit of sensationalism, in his own language: "Informed sources," "a number of influential Members of Congress of both parties," "administration critics," "a number of observers with limited access to intelligence data," "these observers," "the Air Force is said to have urged," "a majority of experts," "those urging," "administration spokesmen," "critics."

Now indeed has American journalism reached the point where this kind of reporting is classed as responsible?

I suggest if all these faceless experts, critics, what have you, feel this strongly about this matter let them put their names to what they allege so that those who question their alleged statements can ask them how they document what they allege. And if they are not willing to put their names behind their statements their statements do not deserve to be reported to the people by responsible journalists.

I think this manner of public discussion of important public issues is the most dangerous single thing to the welfare of our country we face today. The Congress provides the proper forum for people to present their views and facts on these important issues. Let us start using the congressional forums of the House and the Senate where press releases and irresponsible statements give way to considered statements subject to cross-examination of witnesses who are ready to stand behind their statements and indeed point out in detail where they gathered their information and what logic they used to reach their conclusions.

Only in this way will our society be able to make the correct decisions on the crucial problems that face us today.

Those who are somewhat sophisticated in political life, of course, know what Mr. Witkin is up to. He is writing a "think" piece to prepare the way for one of the serious debates that will occur in this Congress and to try to rally public support behind one line of thinking before the Congress or the public has heard both sides. This can only be good for our country in the event that Mr. Witkin and his political associates who share his views happen to be right. But I would suggest to Mr. Witkin and his political associates, if their facts and argument are so sound, why not win the debate fairly in the proper forums set up for these debates on the Senate and House floors instead of trying to win it by arousing the people through cleverly written articles disguised as news.

The article from the St. Louis Post-Dispatch follows:

UNITED STATES TURNS DOWN AIR FORCE PLAN FOR INCREASING ICBM FORCE—BUDGET IS SAID TO PROVIDE FOR ONLY 130 MISSILES BY 1962—RUSSIA COULD HAVE 500 TO 1,000 BY THEN

(By Richard Witkin)

NEW YORK, January 9.—In the face of warnings of a fast-developing missile gap, the administration has rejected Air Force recommendations for increasing the planned force of intercontinental ballistic missiles, informed sources disclosed yesterday.

The proposed budget for fiscal 1960 is said to contain no money to expand the ICBM force beyond the 13 squadrons previously authorized.

The administration's overall defense proposals already have provoked strong criticism from a number of influential Members of Congress in both parties. The issue of the ICBM force promises to provide much of the ammunition in the defense debate now getting under way in Congress.

The proposed budget figure for fiscal 1960 has been held, in the interests of budget balancing, to $40,900 million. This is about $100 million more than the expected total for the fiscal year that ends June 30.

LESS IN 1960 THAN IN 1959

Administration critics argue that, if inflation and military payrolls are considered, the 1960 proposal may provide less than the 1959 budget for military hardware.

The 13 ICBM squadrons authorized to date include 9 of the Atlas and 4 of the Titan.

The Atlas is a 1½ stage missile due to reach initial combat status this summer. All three rocket engines fire at takeoff. Two of them drop away after expending their fuel. The Titan is a two-stage ICBM slated for operational duty starting about mid-1961. Both missiles are designed to carry large thermonuclear warheads a distance of 6,325 statute miles in less than 30 minutes.

At some 10 missiles a squadron, 13 squadrons would give the Nation a total ICBM force of 130 by about 1962. A number of observers with limited access to intelligence data have warned repeatedly that by 1962 the Russians would, or at least could, have an ICBM force totaling 500 to 1,000 missiles.

These observers fear that the huge disparity between such a force and that planned by this country might tempt the Soviet Union either to launch an allout attack or blackmail the West with the threat of such an attack.

MORE SQUADRONS SOUGHT

The Air Force is said to have urged authorization in the 1960 budget of at least seven additional ICBM squadrons.

A majority of experts reject the view that the missile gap could be filled either by the Navy's fleet ballistic missile, the submarine-based Polaris, or the Minuteman, a third-generation Air Force ICBM to be produced in large numbers.

Neither, it is argued, could be available in significant strength until 1963 nor later.

Those urging increased Atlas-Titan funds insist that the money must be voted in the 1960 budget if the enlarged force—missile plus launching sites—are to be ready for the 1961–63 gap period.

Administration spokesmen have rejected the gap thesis on grounds that the figures for Soviet ICBM production are hypothetical. It appears to take the position that there is no need to increase this Nation's force until hard evidence is available that Russia is producing ICBM's in large quantities.

Critics answer that there is considerable intelligence evidence of Russia's capacity to produce 500 ICBM's or more by 1961 or 1962. They add that, by the time confirmation is obtained of actual volume production, it may be too late to produce the required counterforce in time to deter a missile blitz.

COMMITTEE ON UN-AMERICAN ACTIVITIES

The SPEAKER. Under the previous order of the House the gentleman from California [Mr. ROOSEVELT] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Mr. Speaker, I have filed a resolution amending the House rules to abolish the House Committee on Un-American Activities and to transfer its jurisdiction to the Committee on the Judiciary.

At the outset I wish to emphasize that by abolishing the committee it is not my intention to have the House cease its activity in investigating subversion.

As a matter of fact, my resolution will strengthen this function by responding to the Supreme Court decisions on the mandate of the House Committee on Un-American Activities, without which response any effective legislative action would seem to be most questionable.

I propose that the House amend clause 12(c) of House rule XI so that the Committee on the Judiciary will have jurisdiction to investigate and consider matters involving seditious activity, as well as matters involving espionage over which it presently has jurisdiction.

On May 22 of this past year, in discussing the Alaska Constitution, on the floor, I emphasized the basic soundness in the Supreme Court's decision in Watkins against United States.

In Watkins against United States, the Supreme Court held that a "person is entitled to have knowledge of the subject to which the interrogation is deemed pertinent with the same degree of explicitness and clarity that the due-process clause requires in the expression of any element of a criminal offense."

I do not believe that any colleague of mine would dispute this basic proposition upon which the decision rests. Namely, that if a person is to be indicted for criminal contempt because of his refusal to answer a question put by the Committee on Un-American Activities he should be accorded the same basis for predicting the consequences of his conduct as he does with respect to every other criminal conduct.

Indeed, if I were asked what I consider to be the essential difference between life in a free society and life in a Communist society, I would say that it is the ability to predict the criminal consequences of one's act. And this is precisely the principle the Court sustained in Watkins against United States.

However, we recognize full well that the Watkins decision does not provide a remedy specific enough to curb the abuse involved in the functioning of the Committee on Un-American Activities by its central holding.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROOSEVELT. If the gentleman will forgive me, would he withhold his question until I have finished?

Mr. WALTER. I had the thought in mind that the gentleman would like to know that the Barenblatt case is before the courts now.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. I recognize that, and will deal with it.

We have the basic constitutional obligation to face up to the question whether it is possible with the present mandate of the Committee on Un-American Activities to determine the pertinence of a question with the clarity constitutionally required by the Watkins decision.

At this point, the mandate bears quoting. The House Committee on Un-American Activities is empowered to investigate "the extent, character, and objects of un-American activities in the United States, diffusion within the United States of subversive and un-American propaganda that is instigated from foreign countries or of a domestic origin and attacks the principle of the form of government as guaranteed by our Constitution."

I ask my colleagues in all candor how can we expect a witness to resolve for himself whether a question put by the committee is authorized, in view of the vagueness of the authorization. It would be well to read the Supreme Court's comment in this connection:

> It would be difficult to imagine a less explicit authorizing resolution. Who can define the meaning of "un-American"? What is that single, solitary, "principle of the form of government as guaranteed by our Constitution?"

And let me read further:

> It is, of course, not the function of this Court to prescribe rigid rules for the Congress to follow in drafting resolutions establishing investigating committees. That is a matter peculiarly within the realm of the legislature, and its decisions will be accepted by the courts up to the point where their own duty to enforce the constitutionally protected rights of the individual is affected. An excessively broad charter, like that of the House Un-American Activities Committee, places the courts in an untenable position if they are to strike a balance between the public need for a particular interrogation and the right of citizens to carry on their affairs free from unnecessary governmental interference. It is impossible in such a situation to ascertain whether any legislative purpose justifies the disclosures sought, and, if so, the importance of that information to the Congress in furtherance of its legislative function. The reason no court can make this critical judgment is that the House of Representatives itself has never made it. Only the legislative assembly initiating an investigation can assay the relative necessity of specific disclosures.

I believe also we have to contend in this Congress with the problem suggested by the U.S. Court of Appeals dissent of Chief Justice Edgerton in Barenblatt against United States, decided almost a year ago on January 16, 1958, which is now before the Supreme Court. I believe the Court will sustain the dissent below:

> I understand Watkins to hold that the Committee on Un-American Activities had no authority to compel testimony because it had no definite assignment from Congress. The Supreme Court said: "When first amendment rights are threatened, the delegation of power to the committee must be clearly revealed in its charter."

In short, we cannot possibly continue in this Congress with the present Committee on Un-American Activities. And, as a practical matter, I believe that it cannot function properly under the present cloud of legal uncertainty which pervades its operation.

My resolution provides that the function of investigating subversion now be placed in the hands of the Committee on the Judiciary. The Committee on the Judiciary already has the power to investigate matters involving espionage. I have proposed that this power be extended to all "seditious activity." I believe this term characterizes with greater legal precision the area of subversion in which Congress has the constitutional power to legislate.

The term "seditious activity" which I have proposed to cover an expansion of the House Judiciary Committee mandate has been formulated with great care.

It is not a term that will cut down the investigative power of Congress in the area of internal security.

Let me give to the House a definition of "sedition" which appears in Arizona Publishing v. Harris (20 Ariz. 446, 181, 373, 375), which defines "sedition" as:

> Insurrectionary movement tending toward treason, but wanting an overt act; attempts made by meeting or speeches or by publications to disturb the tranquillity of the state.

Alis. Criminal Law, 580, narrows down the definition as follows:

> That though the ultimate object of sedition is a violation of the public peace, or at least such a course of measures as evidently engenders it, yet it does not aim at direct and open violence against the laws or the subversion of the Constitution.

It can readily be grasped that the term "seditious activity" comes as close as it is possible within the meaning of the Watkins case in defining that area of first amendment conduct which can be properly investigated by Congress.

We will thus be avoiding the problems arising from the lack of power in Congress emphasized by the courts to expose persons by the investigative process for the mere sake of exposure.

We would be conforming to what our colleague, Mr. KEATING, who has now gone to the other House, wrote in 29 Notre Dame Lawyer 212, as to the proper scope of congressional inquiry:

> The rights of Congress are no broader than the legitimate objects from which they have been implied. And I believe those objects are only the two referred to a moment ago: (1) to gather facts about proposed legislation, and (2) to inquire into the workings of existing Federal laws. There lies the first and perhaps the only important substantive restraint which Congress must impose upon itself. No congressional investigation is justified unless it can be directly related to the lawmaking process in one of these two ways. In other fields, investigations are proper and often necessary, but not by Congress. It follows that I disagree strongly with those who argue that Congress is also responsible for informing and educating the public by looking into anything which may happen to catch the popular fancy at the moment.

I would point out that on the Committee on the Judiciary we will have the experience of two present members of the Committee on Un-American Activities to guide its work—the chairman, Mr. WALTER, and Mr. WILLIS, of Louisiana.

I also would point out that I want it specifically understood that I have conferred with Chairman WALTER of the Committee on Un-American Activities, expressing, as I now want to express to my colleagues, full assurance that there is no direct or implied criticism of the committee members in any fashion; nor is my recent action in introducing the resolution to abolish the Committee on Un-American Activities and to have the Committee on the Judiciary assume jurisdiction in matters involving seditious activity predicated on direct or implied criticism of any particular situation.

However, there is justified criticism that the Congress, up to now, has not met the issue raised by the Supreme Court. As responsible and responsive legislators we cannot continue to ignore or evade the issue without running the risk of doing great damage to the internal security of our country. Neither can we run the additional risk of weakening our position in which we pridefully appear before the world—a country that protects itself without violating fundamental constitutional rights of the individual.

There are, and have been for many years, citizen groups throughout the country who have urged the abolition of the Un-American Activities Committee. There is no doubt in my mind that a fringe of these groups has been Communist dominated, or Communist inspired.

I realize full well that in introducing my resolution there will be those who will adjudge me guilty of associating with some of these fringe groups to abolish the committee.

It is an old tactic that has been practiced, and I hope now no longer will be practiced, to condemn or to ascribe guilt by association. I hope that that will not be true, and I do not believe it will be true, under the present circumstances in the House.

In response to this anticipated charge, let me make it unequivocally clear that my proposal has no relevance to the campaign of certain groups to abolish the committee.

My proposal is designed simply to carve out of the recent legal decisions a constitutionally permissible area for congressional investigation of seditious activity. And I repeat that I am not wedded to the structure of my proposal which involves the assumption of jurisdiction by the House Judiciary Committee, a good part of which it has already. If there are better ways, let us find them now.

But let us not go on defying and ignoring the Supreme Court decisions.

Those who insist that we must not tamper with the present mandate of the Un-American Activities Committee in the face of the decision in Watkins against United States, and what I believe promises to be the decision in Barenblatt against United States, are blind to the necessity of responding to these decisions if we are to conduct proper inquiries into internal security with effectiveness.

I would say to my distinguished colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALTER] that if it should be the proposal that we should wait for that decision, I would certainly be ready to act in accord with it.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. ROOSEVELT. I am happy to yield.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the gentleman has not read Watkins carefully or he would not have made the statement that he did. But, after all, the very question that has been raised here as to what is the meaning of un-American activities has been raised in the Barenblatt case. The gentleman mentioned the minority opinion, I am sure, with the hope that that would be adopted by the Supreme Court as the majority opinion.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. The belief, sir.

Mr. WALTER. However, let me say to the gentleman that he should not be too optimistic about it, not even with this Court; because on two occasions this Court had the opportunity to state that the law is what the gentleman from California hopes it to be, and in the Barenblatt case refused to take that position.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Mr. Speaker, I shall simply say that what the gentleman is saying is that if the Supreme Court should disappoint him, and agree with me, then obviously this resolution is very worthy of careful consideration.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, because I believe that gentlemen on all sides of this question have a common objective, I sincerely believe it is imperative that the Committee on Rules, to which this resolution was referred, should grant, perhaps after the Supreme Court decision which we have just discussed, an early hearing regarding this entire problem of subversion, espionage, and seditious activity in order to determine how best to handle it and to make clear just exactly what the House of Representatives wants in the way of assigning jurisdiction over this problem.

I, therefore, urge that as many of my colleagues as possible join me in working toward an early hearing by the Committee on Rules for the reasons I have just presented.

It is my hope that my colleagues will join me in making an all-out effort to achieve our mutual objective: a more effective internal security program aligned with the constitutional guarantees of individual freedom, which have made our Nation outstanding as the leader of the free peoples of the world.

I offer my proposal in a spirit of good will toward those who might differ with me as to its form.

Certainly, no one can differ with the intent of my proposal—that is, to clear up any constitutional doubt as to the scope of congressional inquiry into the field of internal security.

My proposal is made with as much consideration to security as it is to individual rights.

HOUSE UN-AMERICAN ACTIVITIES COMMITTEE

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. ALBERT). Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHERER] is recognized for 45 minutes.

Mr. SCHERER. Mr. Speaker, in your excellent speech last Wednesday, when you for the ninth time assumed the speakership of this House, you said that we live in a day which, in your opinion, is the most dangerous period that civilization has gone through since the man Jesus walked the shores of Galilee 20 centuries ago, preaching peace. No informed person can disagree with that statement of yours, Mr. Speaker.

This threat to civilization of which you spoke exists because the security, the safety, and the very existence of this great country of ours—the light and hope of the chaotic world—are on the timetable of the Soviets in their drive for world domination. The evidence before the House Committee on Un-American Activities, from men like Gen. Albert Wedemeyer, Gen. Claire Chennault, and many others in a position to know, indicates that it is quarter to twelve midnight.

The President, in the opening paragraph of his state of the Union message to this Congress on last Friday, expressed his great concern and doubts when he asked the question:

> Can government based upon liberty and the God-given rights of man permanently endure when ceaselessly challenged by a dictatorship, hostile to our mode of life, and controlling an economic and military power of great and growing strength?

If there are any doubting Thomases, let me ask them this: Why have we spent, since the Korean war, in a so-called period of peace, the staggering and unbelievable sum of approximately $200 billion for the defense of this Nation and the free world from the Communist conspirators in the Kremlin? This amount for defense alone in the last 6 years is more than three times the amount spent by this Government for all of its functions, in war and in peace, from its founding in 1776 to and through the end of World War I.

Why are we drafting American boys today for service in 59 different countries all over the world? Why are we jittery almost to the point of irrationality in the race to control outer space?

The great Armed Services Committee of this Congress and the Defense Department have built a military machine with a striking force greater than in all history. As a result, at this moment, the overall firepower and destructive force of the United States and our would-be destroyer is fairly well balanced.

Consequently, we are not going to have an all-out war in the foreseeable future. The Communists are not stupid. They are not going to risk annihilation of their cities. In other words, they are not going to sign their own death warrant by starting an all-out nuclear war. And why should they? In fact, there is almost every reason for them not to do so.

It was in 1918 that a handful of Communists took over Russia. In the short space of the 40 years that followed, the Communists have gained domination and control of approximately one-third of the peoples of the world and one-third of its land mass. Another one-third, in the so-called neutral bloc, is fast drifting toward the Communist orbit.

As you said, Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday, it has been 20 centuries since the humble Nazarene walked the shores of Galilee, and yet after all of those years only one-third of the peoples of this world comprise the Christian-Judaic bloc, today referred to as the West, which, as we know, symbolizes the setting sun.

How have the Communists come so far in the short span of 40 years? By outward aggression? No. Their success, yesterday, today, and tomorrow, has been and will be largely the result of the use of a new weapon of warfare far more effective than hydrogen bombs or guided missiles.

The Soviets have used the insidious and diabolical weapon of infiltration and subversion, of assassination and abduction, of espionage and sabotage, plotted in Moscow and carried out all over the world. It is by the use of this new weapon that they have been able to take once free countries behind the Iron Curtain. They know that one agent or sympathizer within a free country is more effective in reaching their objective than 10,000 trained troops poised on the border.

So you can readily see why there is not going to be all-out military aggression if the Russians can help it.

What I say is not mere speculation. The House Committee on Un-American Activities has heard numerous witnesses, some of the world's outstanding experts. Let me quote from the testimony of Edward Hunter, one of the outstanding authorities of Communist psychological warfare, a former newspaperman, and officer in the O.S.S., an author, journalist, and lecturer, a man who spent 31 years of his life in countries under Communist pressure and attack. He testified:

War has changed its form. The Communists have discovered that a man killed by a bullet is useless. He can dig no coal. They have discovered that a demolished city is useless. Its mills produce no cloth.

The objective of modern warfare is to capture intact the minds of the people and their possessions so that they can be put to use. This is the modern conception of slavery, that puts all others into the kindergarten age.

Hunter continued:

The United States is the main battlefield in this war. I mean specifically the people and the soil and the resources of the United States. They seek to conquer the United States in a manner so that it falls voluntarily into the Red orbit.

If we have to be conquered by destructive nuclear-age weapons, it will be considered a setback by the Kremlin. Their objective is to make the same use of the American people as they make of the Czechs in the uranium mines of Czechoslovakia and as they make of the Chinese in the mills of China.

We are to become the subjects of a new world order for the benefit of a mad little knot of despots in the Kremlin. We are losing so fast that, unless we put a very drastic end to it, the question of who is winning will be academic in a decade.

Gen. Albert Wedemeyer who, you will recall, served as chief of our World War II planning operations, appraised the situation this way in testimony before the committee. He said:

The Soviets are obtaining their objectives without the use of military force. If I were the senior planner in the Soviet hierarchy, I would advise Khrushchev to continue to do exactly what he is doing now.

Khrushchev, in addressing a group of foreign diplomats, including the United States Ambassador, had the audacity to say:

We will beat the capitalists, but that does not mean killing anybody. * * * When we win in this competition, we will also re-educate you. We Bolsheviks are a ravenous people. What we achieved in the past is very little. We want more and more.

Way back in 1923, in outlining the steps the Soviets would take in bringing the world under the heel of the Communist apparatus, Lenin said:

First, we will take Eastern Europe; then the masses of Asia; then Africa; then we will encircle the United States which will be the last bastion of capitalism. We will not have to attack. It will fall like an overripe fruit into our hands.

Mr. Speaker, the real threat to the remaining countries of the free world, including the United States, is from within. Testimony before the House Committee on Un-American Activities reveals that in Africa today, while the Soviets are outwardly pretending to support the nationalist aspirations of those countries, each country is infiltrated in key places in government by natives who are dedicated Communists and whose loyalty is to the Soviet Union and the Communist conspiracy. When the time comes, they will flip those countries into the Soviet orbit. Remember, it takes only a comparatively few people in key positions to accomplish such a result.

The Communists and their apologists in the United States today are shouting from the rooftops, through the press, over the radio, and in the mail to the Members of this Congress that there is no longer an internal threat to the United States, although the files of the Committee on Un-American Activities and the Federal Bureau of Investigation are bulging with uncontroverted evidence to the contrary.

J. Edgar Hoover, perhaps the greatest authority on internal subversion in the United States, time and time again has vigorously disputed these contentions of the pink fringe. Listen to Hoover's latest warning:

Public apathy is the sure way to national suicide—to death of individual freedom. It allowed the Communists to penetrate and make satellites of once-free countries, and it is presently enabling them to honeycomb and weaken the structures of the remaining countries, and there is today a terrifying apathy on the part of Americans toward the deadliest danger which this country has ever faced. Some of that apathy is deliberately induced.

The Communist Party in the United States is not out of business; it is not dead; it is not even dormant. It is, however, well on its way to achieving its current objective, which is to make you believe that it is shattered, ineffective, and dying. When it has fully achieved this first objective, it will then proceed inflexibly toward its final goal. * * *

Those who try to minimize its danger are either uninformed or they have a deadly ax to grind.

Are you going to listen to those who have an ax to grind—to those whose red slips show with every gust of wind, or will you give credence to the findings of one of your own committees and of the Federal Bureau of Investigation?

Last year the committee found that the penetration had reached one of the committees of this House, not 5 years ago, not 2 years ago, but as late as last fall. Let me read excerpts from the testimony concerning Wilfred Lumer who was writing recommendations and reports for legislation which you gentlemen may consider this year.

Mr. Arens, counsel for the committee, asked this question of Mr. Lumer:

Have you reported your activities on the Hill, on Capitol Hill, over the course of the last several years to a person known by you to be a Communist?

Mr. LUMER. I must decline to answer that question on the grounds of the first and fifth amendments.

Mr. ARENS. We have information, and I want to be absolutely frank with you, Mr. Lumer—we have information that in the recent past you have been in contact with, and under discipline of, Sam Abbott, a ranking Communist in the District of Columbia. We want to give you an opportunity now while under oath to deny it.

Mr. LUMER. I must decline to answer that on the grounds of the first and fifth amendments.

The committee just last week issued its report on "Patterns of Communist Espionage." Does this report deal with events of 5, 10, and 15 years ago? Is the committee dealing with patterns of the past, as an editorial in the Washington Post claims, or do these findings relate to what is happening today? As the report reveals, at this moment the Russian Embassy and almost every Russian consulate throughout the United States, as well as the embassies and consulates of Iron Curtain countries, are literally spy and espionage nests. How many, under the cloak of diplomatic immunity have engaged in espionage and Communist conspiratorial activities in the last 2 years? How many citizens and residents of the United States are being threatened and blackmailed into serving the Communist apparatus, a fifth column operating within the United States?

All I ask you gentlemen is just to read some of the scores of reports issued since the gentleman from Pennsylvania, FRANCIS WALTER, assumed the chairmanship of our committee. I guarantee that those of you who have sufficient hair on your heads will find it standing on end. I guarantee you that, if the American people generally knew of the evidence revealed by our committee, it would drive from public office and from positions of influence in American life those who have joined the Communist conspiracy in this country in an effort to discredit the FBI, its Director, the Committee on Un-American Activities, and its chairman.

After long hours of exasperating and painstaking work by the Customs and Post Office Departments and the staff and members of the Committee on Un-American Activities during the past 2 years, we have found that 10 million pieces of Communist propaganda are coming into the United States each year. This propaganda in 13 different languages is directed to individuals, youth organizations, colleges, and various nationality groups through the U.S. mail.

I call your attention to just one piece of literature which was in evidence in the Buffalo hearings of this committee a short time ago. It was printed in Peiping in a dozen different languages for dissemination throughout the world. The thousands of copies that found their way into the United States were, of course, in English for consumption here. It was supposedly an authentic document on atrocities committed by the U.S. Army in South Korea. The detailed, alleged atrocities by American boys against Orientals would make your stomach turn—atrocities allegedly committed since the armistice.

Through such propaganda you now see how the Communists have succeeded in brainwashing 600 million Chinese who from time immemorial were friends of the United States but now hate us with an unprecedented bitterness. Can you not see that these 10 million pieces of Communist propaganda coming into the United States each year to almost every nationality group within our borders are creating dissension, hatred, and distrust, not only among our people but also against the Government of the United States, including committees of this House?

Do you know that there are 2,000 potential saboteurs working in defense plants today? Do you know that the committee has revealed that there are dedicated Communists working in close proximity to the nine transatlantic cables which carry confidential data from the State Department and Pentagon to Europe, and that it has been testified to before our committee that in time of internal upheaval or war with the Soviet Union these cables could be sabotaged in a matter of minutes?

Is anyone in this House so naive as to believe that there are not persons in this country ready, willing, and able to participate in attacks and demonstrations—when the time comes—similar to those perpetrated against the Vice President in South America last year? Can we not see that such demonstrations are battles in the cold war in which we are now engaged; that the South American demonstrations against NIXON were instigated for the purpose of attempting to show to the world that the South American countries, our cousins and friends, had turned against the imperialistic United States?

Oh, yes, the recent revelations of the committee, in spite of the fact that its hands have been tied to some extent by shocking decisions of the Supreme Court, have been hitting those who would destroy us from within where it hurts.

About a year ago in Carnegie Hall in New York, the Emergency Civil Liberties Committee, controlled and dominated by identified Communists, gathered for the sole purpose of starting a campaign to discredit and weaken the Federal Bureau of Investigation and its Chief, J. Edgar Hoover, and to abolish the Committee on Un-American Activities. They have had the support during the last 2 years of the same apologists, some in high places, who have wittingly or unwittingly served the Communist cause in the United States for many years.

When this Congress convened on Wednesday, you saw almost a full-page ad in the Washington Post, signed by a list of persons, many of whom are prominent in some field of activity, charging the committee with increasing bitterness between religious and racial groups, and then asking for the abolition of the House Committee on Un-American Activities.

Most people do not know that the majority of these signers over the years have either belonged to or supported all kinds of Communist-front activities in the United States. Any Member of this Congress, by a telephone call to the committee's office, can find out just who these people are and what service they have rendered repeatedly to the Communist-front apparatus. They are opposed to the committee because the evidence before it has shown how some of them have foolishly and carelessly slept in the same bed with the agents of the Kremlin.

What about these people and their influence? Let us look at what Georgi Dimitrov, one of the fathers of communism, said about them:

> As Soviet power grows, there will be greater aversion to Communist parties everywhere. So we must practice the techniques of withdrawal. Never appear in the foreground. Let our friends do the work.

Dimitrov continues:

> We must always remember that one sympathizer is generally worth more than a dozen militant Communists. A university professor, who, without being a party member, lends himself to the interests of the Soviet Union, is worth more than a hundred men with party cards. A writer of reputation, or a retired general, is worth more than 500 poor devils who don't know any better than to get themselves beaten up by the police.

Dimitrov concludes:

> Every man has his value, his merit. The writer who, without being a party member, defends the Soviet Union, the union leader who is outside our ranks but defends Soviet international policy, is worth more than a thousand party members.

In addition to the ad in the Washington Post on the opening day of this Congress, the Members of this House also found on their desks a letter from the National Lawyers Guild urging the abolition of this committee. The National Lawyers Guild, by overwhelming evidence, has been found to be the legal arm of the Communist Party in the United States.

On your desk also there was a bulletin issued by the Emergency Civil Liberties Committee, the committee which is spearheading the drive to discredit the FBI and your House Committee on Un-American Activities. It is headed by Harvey O'Connor, an identified Communist, who has been cited for contempt of this Congress.

The Committee on Un-American Activities last year issued a report entitled "Operation Abolition" which tells the whole story of the efforts of the Emergency Civil Liberties Committee in its current objective. It gives you the Communist and Communist-front records of the leaders of this committee. The chairman of our committee sent you a copy of this publication today.

Another communication urging the abolition of the committee which most members received last Wednesday morning was from the Citizens Committee To Preserve American Freedoms, an adjunct of the Emergency Civil Liberties Committee in the Los Angeles area. This blast was signed by Dorothy Marshall. Dorothy Marshall, her husband, and the great majority of the members of this committee have long Communist-front records or have served the Communist cause for many years. It is the feeling of the members of your Committee on Un-American Activities that you should know the source of the propaganda with which you have been bombarded.

Has this campaign been effective? Yes. So effective that a resolution has been introduced in this Congress to abolish the Committee on Un-American Activities. During the past campaign every member of this committee, whether he was a Democrat or a Republican, and particularly the committee's distinguished chairman, had to run the gauntlet of vicious attacks, dirty, lying, smearing innuendoes from the Communists and their so-called respectable apologists.

Soon after my election to Congress for the first time in 1952, I accepted a place on the Committee on Un-American Activities. I had neither misgivings nor forebodings. Our boys were dying under Communist fire in Korea. The mischief wrought by Communist agents within was no longer a matter of surmise; enough of it had been exposed in detail to alarm the American people. To help dislodge these internal enemies seemed to me a task which any patriotic American could undertake proudly.

What I failed to foresee was that the mere act of joining this committee would make one a target for organized slander, regardless of how one might conduct himself. I was not unfamiliar with the rugged give and take of political life, but not until I joined the struggle against Red sedition had anyone impugned my patriotism, honesty, and decency. Thereafter, I had to accustom myself to being called—to my face, in print, and on the air—a witch-hunter and character assassin, an inquisitor and Fascist. I had become an enemy of the Bill of Rights.

Anyone who ascends to the chairmanship of this committee particularly becomes the focal point of bitter and vicious attacks, no matter what his previous record might be. I remember well within a few weeks after the gentleman from Pennsylvania became chairman of this committee, and before anyone could possibly know what his position might be on the various issues confronting the committee, we had hearings in Newark, N.J. Twelve hundred pickets, many of them brought over from New York, surrounded our hotel. Placards, obviously prepared by experts of the Communist propaganda machine, were carried by people, some of whom could not even understand the import of the signs they carried. I can well remember these placards. Some read: "Walterism worse than McCarthyism." Others read: "WALTER, union-buster, go home."

The critics of the committee like to compare our hearings—unfavorably, of course—with proceedings in courts. Yet no self-respecting justice of the peace would tolerate for a minute the kind of browbeating my colleagues and I have been subjected to for hours on end. Any witness or lawyer who dared bait a judge as contemptuously as we are regularly baited from the witness box would quickly find himself in jail.

Our committee has been accused of abusing the civil rights of witnesses and of fixing guilt by association. The fact is that, since I have been a member of this committee, we have followed as nearly as practicable the rules of evidence used in our courts. No person has been named as a member of the Communist apparatus unless and until he has been identified under oath by one or more witnesses who have personal knowledge of the facts. On such identifications no hearsay evidence is permitted. The rules of the committee provide that any person who is adversely mentioned in any hearing has, upon request, the right to appear in public session and affirm, deny, or explain any adverse testimony.

I have served on another committee of this Congress, and I have seen other committees in action. I am not being critical of those committees, but let me say that these committees regularly admit hearsay evidence, and properly so since a committee is not a court. On occasion I, along with other Members of this House, have questioned high officers of this Government and reputable citizens of the United States more vigorously, forcibly, and sometimes with more sarcasm than any member of the Committee on Un-American Activities ever dared to question a known member of the Communist conspiracy.

Some years ago I served in the office of the prosecuting attorney of my home State. If I had handled an ordinary pickpocket as carefully and gingerly as I am compelled to cross-examine an agent of the Communist conspiracy, I would have been fired from my job. No committee of the Congress protects the civil rights of individuals more carefully, nor follows more closely the rules of evidence than does the Committee on Un-American Activities. Yet it is daily accused and hounded for allegedly doing otherwise, often by people and newspapers who should know better.

The leftwing crowd cries crocodile tears every time a Communist is called before a committee and questioned about his traitorous activities. They strain at gnats to find excuses for his conduct, while at the same time they attack the committee's motives and procedures in calling him.

This same leftwing crowd, however, when an industrialist suspected of wrongdoing or labor racketeer is called before a congressional committee regularly condemns them before any real evidence of wrongdoing is shown. They are ready to hang such people if they use the fifth amendment. But when a Communist invokes the fifth amendment frivolously and without basis before the House Committee on Un-American Activities, and we question him to determine whether he is in good faith pleading the fifth amendment, immediately the committee is attacked.

The tragedy of this whole situation concerning the controversy over the committee is the fact that the clever propagandists of the Communist conspiracy have succeeded in brainwashing many people as to the actual objectives and activities of the committee. It is generally charged that the committee is investigating people's beliefs and associations; that it is engaged in investigating communism as a political and economic philosophy or way of life; that the Communist Party is a political party as we know political parties in the United States. There is absolutely no truth or basis in fact for any of these assertions.

The truth is that the committee has never been interested in nor has it investigated a person's beliefs, philosophy, or political associations. It is not interested, nor has it inquired as to whether an individual believes in communism as a political or economic philosophy or way of life.

The committee's investigations have been conducted for the purpose of recommending legislation to protect the internal security of this country from a conspiratorial apparatus—a fifth column, the arm of a foreign power operating within the United States for the purpose of eventually bringing about the destruction of this country, including the use of force and violence, if necessary. We, therefore, have and are investigating members of this conspiracy and their activities which are directed toward accomplishing this objective.

Let us go back to the issue raised by the resolution offered by the gentleman from California, which calls for the abolition of the Committee on Un-American Activities.

As I have tried to point out in these remarks, we have armed ourselves to the teeth at astronomical costs to defend ourselves from Soviet aggression from without—an aggression which in all probability will never come. On the other hand, as I have shown, the real threat to the security of the free world and this Nation is from within, from internal subversion, often called indirect aggression.

Today there are two groups alerted to and dealing with the threat from within: the Federal Bureau of Investigation in the executive branch and the House Committee on Un-American Activities in the legislative branch. Both at this moment are under attack, an attack originated and inspired by the Communist conspirators and joined in by many well-meaning and some not so well-meaning people.

We have, as I have pointed out, the great Armed Services Committee which has done a magnificient job in preparing us for aggression from without. We have a Foreign Affairs Committee dealing with the intricate problems arising as the result of our leadership of the free world. We have 17 other committees dealing with the various phases of our domestic life. We have even created an Outer Space Committee so that we will hold our place in the heavens in the years that lie ahead.

In considering the resolution of the gentleman from California, we are concerned with the present, with the very continuity of this country as a sovereign nation. If the threat from within from internal subversion is only one-tenth as great as I have outlined here today, would it not be folly of the worst kind, would it not be suicidal, to destroy the only committee experienced, alerted, and dedicated to recommending legislation to protect the internal security of the United States from what many patriots believe to be the greatest threat in its history.

Now I know that the gentleman from California has said that his resolution will strengthen the function of investigating subversion by turning it over to the Judiciary Committee, which now handles over 56 percent of all bills introduced into the House—a committee already overburdened with work—a committee headed by a chairman who is, to say the least, totally unsympathetic with the work in which the House Committee on Un-American Activities has been engaged.

The Committee on Un-American Activities with its sizable staff is today unable to keep up with requests for investigations, and information now in its files.

Remember in the last few years bills have been introduced in this House on 80 recommendations made by our committee. Legislation has been adopted by this Congress embracing 35 of these recommendations. At the close of the last Congress 26 bills were pending on subjects covered by committee recommendations.

Every informed person in this House knows that the passage of the Roosevelt resolution would sound the death knell of our fight against the Communist conspiracy within the United States.

It is apparent from the gentleman from California's previous attacks upon the committee that his stated motives in support of his resolution are not his real motives. I would respect him more if his resolution called for abolition of the committee and did nothing more. This is what the Emergency Civil Liberties Committee, the Communists, and their apologists in the United States actually want to do.

In fact, the Emergency Civil Liberties Committee in its 1959 program calls not only for the outright abolition of the committee, but also for the repeal of the Smith Act, the Internal Security Act, and the Communist Control Act.

The National Lawyers Guild, the legal arm of the Communist Party in the United States, and all such organizations as the Citizens Committee to Preserve American Freedoms, whose record I have previously discussed, call for the abolition of the committee and the repeal of all legislation that attempts to control in any way the operation of the Communist apparatus within the United States.

Mr. Speaker, we are witnessing Operation Abolition at work. The Roosevelt resolution is aimed directly at this Nation's Achilles' heel.

Mr. BOW. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHERER. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BOW. I rather infer from some of the material coming across my desk in the attempt to abolish the Committee on Un-American Activities that some of it seems to be inspired because the courts have raised certain questions about the procedure of the committee and the procedure of the House. I am sure the gentleman will agree with me that in section 4 of article I of the Constitution it is specifically provided that each House may determine the rules of its procedure and that under this constitutional provision the House has established its rules of procedure. We have that Constitutional right.

Mr. SCHERER. There is no question about that, and if the Supreme Court in the Barenblatt case, which is now pending before it, decides that the gentleman from California is correct or that the minority opinion of the judge of the circuit court of appeals is the law of this land, there is nothing to prevent this House from changing the language of the charter of the Committee on Un-American Activities. That can be done and, naturally, we will do it; although we may not agree with the decision of the Supreme Court. We will change the language of the charter to comply with that decision. That can be easily done.

Mr. BOW. With reference to the courts attempt to ignore this provision of the Constitution which gives the House the right to set up its own rules of procedure, let us examine article 3 of the Constitution of the United States in which is set up the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. The writers of the Constitution recognized that the representations of the people could be trusted with a determination of their own rules. However that court with life tenure should be subject to some control by the people. This was done by incorporating in the Constitution section 2 of article III which provides as follows:

> In all the other Cases before mentioned, the supreme Court shall have appellate Jurisdiction, both as to Law and Fact, with such Exceptions, and under such Regulations as the Congress shall make.

So, here the Constitution establishes the right of the Congress to set the rules and regulations of the appellate procedures and the procedures of the courts, but the Constitution itself says that the House should set its own procedures. So, it seems to me that the courts have gone a little far astray when they say what our procedures should be when the Constitution itself provides that we shall set up our procedures and we also have control over the procedures of the courts.

Mr. SCHERER. I certainly agree with the gentleman from Ohio. He and I both agree that the Supreme Court in instance after instance has invaded the prerogatives of the legislative branch. It has not only interfered with the right of this House to make its own rules but the Court has usurped in case after case the legislative functions of the Congress.

Mr. BOW. Mr. Speaker, I feel that in the best interests of our Nation we should strengthen and support the Committee on Un-American Activities, on which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHERER] serves with such distinction.

CONGRESS SHOULD ENACT A FEDERAL LAW AGAINST BOMBINGS

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill to amend title 18 of the United States Code to make the transportation and/or possession of explosives in interstate commerce, with knowledge and intent that such explosives will be used to damage or destroy any building or structure, a Federal crime. This bill further provides that any person guilty of these acts shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than 1 year, or both, and if death results from a violation of this subsection, shall be subject also to the death penalty or to imprisonment for any term of years or for life.

We have all been deeply shocked by the bombings of schools, places of worship, and other senseless acts of violence and destruction in various sections of our country. And yet we do not have a Federal statute under which persons who committed these acts may be apprehended and punished.

It is true that many of our States do have good, strong laws dealing with this subject, and the bill I propose clearly states that it is not the intent of Congress to infringe upon or weaken the jurisdiction of local law enforcement officials. However, by enacting a Federal law, Federal authorities such as the FBI can move effectively in the program of justice to bring bombers to account and break up this crime, just as the Lindbergh law has proved to be effective in bringing kidnapers to justice, and the Dyer Act, which forbids interstate transit of stolen automobiles, has been responsible for breaking up many car theft rings.

It is my hope that the members of the Judiciary Committee, and the entire membership of the House, as well as those in the other body, will act favorably upon this legislation without undue delay.

SELECT COMMITTEE ON FISCAL ORGANIZATIONS AND PROCEDURES OF THE CONGRESS

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. ALBERT). Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLOOD] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, as I indicated earlier in the day, I have today introduced a House resolution calling for the creation of a select committee of this House on fiscal organizations and procedures of the Congress. I introduced this resolution last year. My distinguished colleague on the other side, the gentleman from California [Mr. LIPSCOMB], introduced then a similar resolution, and I am sure he will do the same again.

My reason for that, Mr. Speaker, is this: Frankly, my primary target is the Bureau of the Budget. This has become a Frankenstein insofar as the legislative processes of this Congress are concerned. This legislative creature, the Bureau of the Budget, now imposes and proposes and disposes as the whims and the fancies of this collection of glorified clerks in that Bureau see fit. There has been developing, beyond the rule of reason, the exercise of a prerogative by the Executive dealing with the refusal to allocate funds appropriated by the Congress. This now goes so far that the Executive sequesters, as he calls it, appropriated funds which this Congress in an appropriation bill from time to time specifies by line items. Now, this is not something thought up by the present administration. This has been done by other administrations and other Presidents. It is not a new "gimmick." I suggest that it is being abused now beyond the rule of reason.

Of course, as a member of the Subcommittee on Appropriations for the Department of Defense, I have a particular "mad on" right now dealing with that subcommittee's chapter of the budget, perhaps, rather than others, although I am advised by my colleagues on the Committee on Appropriations that this exercise is broadly extended to other chapters of the budget as well.

I have heard many rumblings of recent years from my colleagues on both sides of the aisle having to do with this impertinence and presumption by the Bureau of the Budget with reference to what we think are the constitutional legislative prerogatives of the Congress. Specifically that Bureau is making policy on the minute, on the hour, day by day. It is torturing the purpose and the reason for its existence as the Congress created it.

I have discussed this matter with many Members of the House on both sides of the aisle in the past 4 or 5 years or so, with many men who served in the senates of their respective States. Many of my distinguished friends in the House have told me that their States had this problem. They had created a bureau of the budget. It had prostituted and abused its prerogatives, as has this Bureau here. Those sovereign States saw fit to take some kind of legislative action to—what shall I say?—to put manners on these people, or to bring it back to the legislative branch, making it available to the executive for budget construction from time to time, of course, as needed.

I deny the constitutional right of the Executive to exercise without limit this presumed and inferred prerogative on the allocation of appropriated funds. Particularly do I do so with reference to the specified and earmarked line items of the budget.

However, it is not my province to raise the question in the judicial branch of the Government, but I raise it here, Mr. Speaker, by presenting this resolution. This should be a House committee, not a joint committee, because constitutionally appropriations are initated here and because I am concerned with the development in the other body of recent years to take unto themselves increased jurisdiction over the constitutional privileges and prerogatives of this body in the matter of appropriations. About that you have heard a great deal in the last couple of years, Mr. Speaker.

This resolution will provide that the chairman and the ranking member of the Committee on Appropriations shall be members of such a committee. The committee will be equally divided between both sides of the aisle; 10 members of the committee, with no more than 5 to be from the majority side. I shall be in touch with one or two of the members on the other side, and I am sure they will be good enough to join me, as they did last year toward the end of the session, in introducing such a resolution. This will call for an examination of the whole appropriations method. It will call for an examination of the budgetary structure and with particular reference, as you have heard me say, to what I say are alleged defects in the existing budgetary administrative practice.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. To the gentleman from Michigan, that is a happy privilege.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I am sorry I did not hear all of the gentleman's statement, but does the gentleman's argument go so far as to contend that the Executive should spend all we appropriate?

Mr. FLOOD. No.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. FLOOD. I do not know the answer to that. I just want people who know better than I to examine this problem, because I think the Budget Bureau is going beyond the rule of reason. I do not know what the rule should be, but I think the time has come when this budgetary structure and the appropriation method with reference to it should be examined. I do not think we want the Director of the Bureau of the Budget to dictate policies to this House. I am not sure where the demarcating line is. When I say "he" it is not personal; I think the Bureau has gone too far. I do not know how far they should go. But I have the definite sensation that there is a serious problem, and I think a House committee should look into it.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. As I get it, that is the natural tendency on the part of all of these gentlemen, even our Comptroller General. They keep going along a little bit further each session.

Mr. FLOOD. Yes. Of course, the Congress gave birth to the General Accounting Office, an arm of the legislative, and we seem to have pretty strong confidence in them.

May I say that I have discussed with my friend from Missouri, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the introduction of a bill, which we discussed this morning. I will introduce that later. That bill will call for the creation of a Commissioner of the Budget, who will be under the jurisdiction of the legislative branch, but we hope to surround him with such protections that we hope to reduce to a minimum any pressures that now are exercised by the downtown people. I feel that between these two extremes there must be some middle course, because I may say to my friend, for the purpose of emphasis, this is a Frankenstein. These people are becoming a "fourth power." They are expanding and torturing beyond all reason what the Congress meant when we created the Bureau.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I referred to the Comptroller General. Of course, the Congress created that office and the Congress needs that at a time such as this.

Mr. FLOOD. That is right.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. But it seems to me that over the years they have grown so big downtown and assumed so many things to be within their authority that it is time to reexamine their status.

Mr. FLOOD. There is no reason why that cannot be done under the elastic language of this resolution. There is nothing sacred about my writing here, when I refer to the appropriation and budget and fiscal policies of the House. Since he is a creature of the House, there is no reason why he should not be examined by this committee, not at all, and there is no reason why this resolution could not be amended if the committee handling it saw fit to provide for the gentleman's recommendation, not at all. I think the resolution will bring in this officer as well.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. My only thought was that, as I sit on committees and hear the witnesses who come in, every one of these agencies or departments seems to grow all the time. I gradually have been getting the idea that we did not really need any Congress.

Mr. FLOOD. That is the nature of the beast, the gentleman knows that. The bureaucrat feeds on himself.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. If the gentleman will strike out the word "beast" I will go along with him.

Mr. FLOOD. Only a figure of speech. According to the size of the agency his salary and rank are determined, he thinks. I have heard the gentleman and others hold out on this since before the War Between the States. The gentleman has forgotten more than I ever knew on this subject.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Did the gentleman ever get the idea, sitting on these committees, and I know he has sat on many of them on different Government offices, that sometimes the committees get the idea that they know more than the executive departments about running those departments?

Mr. FLOOD. Oh, yes; that is the nature of this beast—also a figure of speech, I hasten to add.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I thank the gentleman very, very much.

Mr. FLOOD. I thank the gentleman from Michigan.

DECLARATION OF AN INTERNATIONAL WAR AGAINST DISEASE

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. ALBERT). Under previous order of the House, the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. FOGARTY] for 20 minutes.

Mr. FOGARTY. Mr. Speaker, some years ago, when the American Heart Association and the National Heart Institute were mobilizing private and public resources to fight heart disease, Dr. Paul Dudley White made a resounding speech in Boston. He called it, I believe, "A Declaration of War Against Heart Disease," and it marked the launching of a great attack that has had great success and shows even more promise for the future.

I propose that we adopt a similar but broader resolve: To declare war on all disease everywhere in the world, to mobilize our resources immediately, and to develop, in partnership with other nations, a worldwide attack upon the common enemy of all mankind, disease.

There is much fearful talk of world war III. Let us resolve that it be a new kind of war—for and in behalf of health instead of death. I strongly believe that our own people and those of all nations will heartily join in starting and carrying through to victory such a new war on disease as the world has never seen before.

Last August, in introducing in the House of Representatives a bill on international medical research as a companion to Senator HILL's measure in the Senate, I spoke of some of the benefits that have accrued from medical research and of some of the potentials that expanded international medical research would bring.

Today, I would not only reiterate how much the world and we have to gain from increased research abroad, but I would point out also that the time is eminently right, now, to seize the opportunity and march with other nations upon this new road of progress. I believe we should and must adopt legislation for expanded international medical research aid and for related, essential measures involving the application of knowledge and such activities as the proposed International Health Year.

As you know my background, you know that in my more than 18 years of service in this House I have labored to know and understand and meet the problems and needs of medical research and public health through adequate support for programs from the Congress. I hope and believe my advice to you, my colleagues, has been always sound and good. Indeed, one of the two most gratifying things in my long experience in Congress has been the continuing endorsement by you of my work, as chairman of the Appropriations Subcommittee for Health, Education, and Welfare, and Labor Departments, in which I have advised strengthening medical research. I have done so, of course, because it is through research that our people's health is being enhanced and life extended and crippling and premature death reduced.

The other most gratifying thing to me is the fact that the good people of Rhode Island have similarly and continually endorsed my devotion to this work for research and health. I can assure you that they are well informed upon this, and, in the majority by which, in the last election, they returned me to the House for another term, the people of Rhode Island showed they wanted the work for health continued, for my platform was built upon the assurance that I would seek increased research and health benefits.

I mention these things about myself as setting for telling you that it is my sober and considered judgment that the time for action upon international measures is this year of 1959, and as soon as possible. The sooner the better. For every month's delay means that much postponement of the human and economic benefits that our own Nation and all nations will reap.

Moreover, although we in America were first to sound the call to arms for health for peace, others have not been slow to sense the dramatic appeal that medical weapons against disease have. Already the Ukraine has put forth a proposal, and, while you and I are certain that such proposals are primarily political and only secondarily humanitarian, the peoples of the world do not know this. Nor do they know that our philosophy for an expanded world health program is first and fundamentally humanitarian and an instrument of public policy in the same sense as those guaranties of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness contained in our American Constitution, which the world acclaims.

I am afraid that the world does not acclaim what we would propose to do because we have talked much and done little. A year has passed since a ringing call of "health for peace" was sounded. Many of us in Congress had, of course, long been aware and working for international medical research and the application of its results, realizing the values for other peoples' and our own health and economy and for vital influences toward peace.

While some things have been accomplished in the past 12 months, and they are extremely encouraging, I fear that other peoples may think of America as talking big and acting laggardly.

Even what America has already contributed to the health of the world is far from well and widely known around the globe, and I say this without decrying the efforts of those who have done such splendid work abroad for health and those who have sought to tell their story. For one thing, certain others have both subtly and blatantly taken credit for American accomplishment. We do not say that America is due more than her share of credit; we know that medical science always advances only through the work of researchers in many countries.

But even in such a field as the development of a successful vaccine against polio, where an American researcher brought to triumphant culmination a search of years to which, as Jonas Salk himself has many times said, many others contributed steppingstones, we can find another nation claiming this success in areas where the people did not know the facts.

Let me tell a little story to illustrate this. It is one, I think, which is illuminating and suggestive in many ways, not the least of which is an indication that America needs to tell her story further, faster, and first.

An American visitor to a Far East country learned, to his astonishment, that the polio vaccine was considered a Russian discovery. The man to whom the American was talking was not a scientist, but nevertheless an educated man. Yet to say merely that America had a greater claim would be taken as American bragging.

Finally, as the conversation continued, the American found a way to suggest the truth.

His host told of how some of his country's territory had been under Russian domination, but was returned, except for a certain area, still held by Russia.

"Who," the American asked, "do the Russians say were the ancestral developers of that area? Do they claim that their people or your people were first?"

"They say it was theirs", his host replied. And then he smiled, as the light dawned and he saw the point. But only then was he willing to believe the best of America.

Perhaps this is far from typical around the world. I wish I could believe so. But I cannot. And yet this sort of thing is only one of the minor reasons, among many major ones, why I am sure we must proceed in 1959 to enact legislation and provide appropriations to help mount a truly great worldwide attack upon disease. We must not only declare international war upon disease with the ultimate victory of better world health, nutrition, and economy and the unity of peace. We must also provide new inspiration and new means to achieve the goal.

How do we make friends for America through international health and research?

There are many, many ways, but I shall mention only a few, just enough to illustrate the point that we can make more friends by talking and acting for the simple needs of people than by high discussions of policy or any other means. By helping people meet vital needs, like food and nutrition and health, we can become their friends and they ours.

As many of you know, I have long been interested in the World Health Organization. Just last summer I was privileged to participate in the great WHO sessions held in Minneapolis, which were a splendid success. Even more important, in terms of friendship for America, was the warm and sincere welcome given by the people of Minnesota and elsewhere to the delegates from 85 nations. They departed with a new and deeper understanding of the American people; they took to their home countries a new respect for our institutions, a new comprehension of what we are, as people interested in our own people and all the people of the world.

In Geneva, where I was a U.S. delegate to WHO, there was a friendliness within the WHO Assembly itself that is tremendously heartening. It outranks all other bodies, I am sure, in creating lasting international friendships. First names are common in the halls. Mutual respect, concern in each other's problems, constructive help, and a sharing of ideas characterize these great assemblies.

So the WHO is an outstanding means whereby we can and do make friends.

What are some of the other ways? One that comes to mind is the contributions and visits abroad of America's fine medical men. Dr. Paul White's international work, not only as a member of professional scientific groups like the international cardiological society, but also as a private practitioner of medicine, has meant much to our country.

Dr. White has helped get research started in places where there was little or none; he has encouraged the beginning of medical schools and hospitals in remote areas; he has tirelessly contributed time and money and his friendly, wise counsel to men of all creeds, colors, and races—all and solely for the advancement of health.

And yet Dr. White is but one of a number of eminent Americans loved and respected and sought around the world for their unselfish medical work. These men are of inestimable value as winners of friends for America. More of our skilled men and women of medicine will, I hope and feel, in days to come expand this friendship even more.

There are many other means, as I said, and on many levels. Take the very practical things, like water and food and standards of living and rolling back the tide of diseases. The DDT sprayer has won friends for us around the world.

What we do to help people get plenty of clean, safe water is understandable to people; it means benefits in terms of their everyday lives, and they can and do appreciate such helps to better living and health. As America also aids them as a partner in their efforts to get adequate food and meet nutritional needs and to improve housing, so also will they become more and more friendly with us—and become our partners for peace, too. These are just some of the ways and means to international friendship, and much more could be said, but I think the point is made.

Let me sketch now something of the problems, the potentials, the programs and their price, and the payoff—all of which are essential factors in considering an expanded international health activity by the United States in partnership with other nations.

First, what is the world health situation today? A glance at this shows the problems and suggests the needs in terms of vitally needed research, essential measures to apply disease prevention and control knowledge, and indispensable means for more trained medical manpower, health facilities, and better education and information dissemination.

Overall, the world health situation shows that man has progressed far in his fight for health; the world is healthier than it has ever been before. There have been sizable declines in the death rates from disease all over the globe, not just in highly developed areas. The world's population has, therefore, been increasing. Yet the increase has not, as some may believe, come about because of great increases in the birth rates. Primarily, the population increase is a result of decreasing death rates in many countries.

This means that medical research advances have been great and have been applied in enough force to effect declines in deaths from disease in many areas. In the last half-century, it has been said, the progress of science has been more rapid than in the previous 2,000 years. The lowering of mortality from disease proves the statement.

Let us not be lulled, however. Little has been done compared to what could be done. Yet this little endeavor has produced results out of all proportion to the funds and manpower invested. I am speaking now particularly of the investment in recent years in international health, not only America's but all others. The cost of the worldwide epidemic intelligence service, for example, which first warned of and then performed yeoman service in last year's influenza epidemic, was in terms of only a few thousands—thousands, not millions—of dollars, and a pitifully small supply of trained medical manpower.

We see new methods of agriculture and land irrigation and the increase in the total of the habitable and tillable area of the world—with influence on health and economy.

Moreover, directly against disease itself we see progress on many fronts. There have been real advances against cholera, a tremendous world problem. Perhaps the most notable victory, although it is like the winning of a battle and not a whole war, has been against malaria. Then there have been gains against typhus, a deadly disease enemy in many parts of the world.

Again from the overall viewpoint, the life span of man on earth has been extended and there has been some decline in the death rate of infants. Progress has been made against venereal disease around the world, and some advance, though little and far from what could or should be accomplished, against tuberculosis.

All this is to the credit side of the ledger. The other side shows that, while we have come far, we have farther still to go. The familiar illustration of the iceberg is apt. What has been achieved is but the top part, which we see, of the iceberg. Nine-tenths of it is underneath. Just so, the greatest part of the world's health problems is still unsolved.

While I have been speaking chiefly of infectious and communicable diseases, and those which no longer are as great a health burden in the United States as the chronic diseases like heart ailments and cancer, I must say that, in those countries abroad where communicable diseases have been reduced, chronic illnesses have emerged as today's great cripplers and killers just as in our country.

Thus, as we all well know, the war against disease has only just begun, in terms of man's life on earth through the ages, in just a few countries. The truly international war for health remains to be declared, as I said earlier.

To return to the problems, we find them tremendous and staggering. The incidence—the rate at which disease strikes—is high in scores and scores of infectious diseases too numerous to mention in hundreds of countries. The prevalence—the amount of debilitating disease—is vast. The mortality from almost any disease one could name in any country, including our own, is far higher than it should be and we cannot be proud of man's record when we think of what can be accomplished if we really turn ourselves and our resources to total war against disease.

There are many diseases now widely prevalent where the simple application of knowledge already won, of public health practices, could greatly reduce or even conquer the problem—among them typhus, yellow fever, venereal disease, rickettsial diseases, some bacterial diseases, and, perhaps above all, what is still a No. 1 world problem: malaria.

Many other diseases, and some of those mentioned, however, still will require intensive research of various kinds, and I would not imply that any great victory in the world war against disease is easy of attainment.

Consider the appalling lack of health resources and facilities, for one thing, and you will see why victory is no easy matter but must be won, as always, with sacrifice and hard toil and expenditures that are hard to come by.

Around the world, there are manpower lacks in medical fields which are tremendous. I believe the world ratio of physicians to population is something like 1 doctor for each 2,000 people; in some or many countries it is perhaps 1 physician to each 10,000 persons. The same holds true for dentists and is so, or nearly so, for other types of necessary health and medical personnel. The ratio of hospitals is probably even worse, with many millions of people almost completely without hospital facilities of any kind within their reach of money or distance.

If I have not stressed the dark side of the picture enough, let me turn to its economic aspects, because a poor economy is always related directly to a sick people.

The great potential markets of many areas of the world cannot be fully opened until the economies of those areas are expanded and their purchasing power is increased. The lessons for our own business and industry, since we are a country that in most things produces goods that we need to sell abroad, are obvious.

Economic advances around the world cannot take place unless the manpower is vigorous and productive. Sick people are not consumers nor producers. A high percentage of the people of the Middle East, much of Asia, large parts of Central and South America, and most of Africa, are sick—suffering from infectious or communicable diseases, many of which are preventable or curable, or from undernutrition, which better health and other things, such as newer methods of agriculture, could alleviate.

The people of these areas cannot, without the partnership of others, build the type of country they should have; they alone cannot control or mold their environment. Yet the great fact of the twentieth century is that man has made his environment largely controllable; the knowledge exists whereby he can, in the main, manage adequate food, shelter, clothing, housing, medicines, and so not merely survive but even enjoy a productive life.

Yet the people of these areas cannot do so without the help of their fellow man in more fortunate countries. They cannot build the base upon which a good economy can be erected. Nor, to be practically worldly, can they be good customers for others.

One of the greatest matters of our times, then, is the fact that the world cannot accommodate, economically and socially, the expanding populations unless those populations are healthy, vigorous producers. In what field could the United States show its great concern for human beings and their happiness, no matter who nor where they are, better than by helping them gain a healthier life through modern technology?

Here is a great opportunity, the greatest perhaps of all time, to show the people of the world that we are concerned with them for their own sake, not to master them but to master their great enemy, disease.

Let us tell the world, in great blazing signs of service, what we are, what we stand for, and what we want them to be; free and healthy men and women under guarantees of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness even as we ourselves are. This is the true American tradition and the real American purpose.

In discussing the problems of the world's health, I have suggested or implied, I believe, more than a little of the potentials that expanded international health and medical research holds in the way of human and economic benefits. I should, however, illustrate more specifically what the victories we may expect in a great new world war against disease will bring.

Here, I shall illustrate the potentials first by citing examples of practical dividends, to the United States as to other nations, achieved through international health means.

The international reporting of disease, and the operation of an early-warning network for worldwide communicable diseases, through the World Health Organization, affords an excellent example of tremendous savings in lives, sickness prevented or controlled, and literally millions of dollars. Think what the cost of the Asian influenza epidemic last year would have been had we not been forewarned. Through the international health communications network, outbreaks of highly infectious or communicable diseases anywhere in the world are broadcast to WHO headquarters in Geneva. Then the news is broadcast to health authorities all over the world, to ships at sea, to airports and seaports, enabling health authorities to apply appropriate measures to check disease spread.

The influenza outbreak shows us how a disease can spread around the globe in a matter of months. Asian flu came from inland China and, spreading in both directions around the world, hit the United States on both coasts at almost the same time. Because of the early warning network we knew of the beginning and the spread and were able to take steps to soften the blow. Extensive measures were adopted, a vaccine was developed, and, while there was much flu sickness, it certainly would have been far worse had we no knowledge of it.

One other example, of a different kind, will be enough to more than prove the future potential of expanded international health activity by citing past experience. This is the case of malaria.

About 10 years ago, some 3 million people died each year from it, and another 300 million suffered from its weakening effects. It may have been, may still be, the world's most costly disease, because of the chronic invalidism it causes and its vast extent. It retards commerce and business and industry and agriculture—and no highly malarial country can be more than a pitiful semblance of what it could be without the disease. Regions of our own country knew this some years ago, and had there been no malaria prevention, control, and treatment programs in the United States we would find ourselves a far less productive Nation than we are.

But technical advances, new knowledge for research, came and changed the grim picture. There were two major advances: one was DDT and the other was drugs. DDT meant the possibility of whipping malaria by eradicating the mosquitoes which spread it. The new drugs meant that the parasite responsible for malaria could be killed in the infected person's body, and safely for him.

Application of this knowledge, and other new information, has done much against malaria. It is still a No. 1 disease for attack by international health measures; it still presents problems of great magnitude not only to health control services but also to research.

Yet the worldwide fight against malaria has had tremendous success, and this one campaign alone has been responsible for perhaps the most outstanding improvement in the world's health.

Today, the number of deaths from malaria have been reduced to about half of the number caused a little over 10 years ago; and the amount of the disease has been similarly reduced. Economic gains have followed in countries where substantial reduction or elimination of malaria has been achieved.

What achieved this? It was won through by cooperative international medical research and application measures, by partnership among nations, and by the World Health Organization and all allied with it. The United States can well be proud of the share it has put into this great enterprise, and we can and should do even more, for the full potential of a world free from malaria, yet to be realized, will mean much to us, as to others, both in humanitarian and in economic terms.

The business future of the United States, we all know, is deeply involved in investments and sales abroad. We will benefit in dollars from medical research and the application of its knowledge to conquer disease. But we are not unique in this. Other countries also depend upon foreign sales and investments. They, too, will benefit. I say this because I do not believe that the American businessman is less altruistic than the thrifty Scots or French businessman, or the shrewd German or Chinese, or the Scandinavian or Australian, or any other. I think that all people, in whatever country, who stop to think, will realize that improved world health is to their good. I think that this matter of expanding research and disease control around the world is one—perhaps the one—truly global effort in which all nations can and will join as real partners.

What this can mean was well expressed last year by Dr. Carmolino Candau, Director General of the WHO, who said:

> I am convinced that, if the great advances gained in science and technology are put at the service of all the people of the world, our children and their children will live in an age from which most of the diseases our grandparents and parents took for granted will be banished. It is in our power to narrow further the gap which exists between the few countries which have already reached a relatively high level of health and the many others which are still in the early stages of their health development.
> Through intensified and well-coordinated research we shall be able to find the means to cure or prevent the diseases which today prevail in the economically developed areas and tomorrow may strike those regions which are in process of rapid development.

Now let me turn to the program, mentioned earlier, which we should establish to win the new war against disease and which will let the world know that the United States is backing its words with faith, friendliness, and finances.

I have noted recently that the Secretary of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare disclosed to the newspapers his budget request for fiscal year 1960. But I failed to find anything in the stories indicating that there would be any administration request for new or additional funds for international medical research and health activities. Yet the administration and the Department have stated strong interest in expansion of health measures for peace.

While I am as stanch an advocate as anyone for not providing for nonessential activities, I do not believe in being penny wise and pound foolish.

I believe in establishing and providing for activities that will bring us far greater returns than the outlays. Increasing the scope of U.S. participation in world medical research and health measures will do this. Moreover, such a strengthening of our international efforts is not merely desirable, it is essential. It is essential to our defense, to our continued and growing prosperity, and to our own national fight to prevent and control killing and crippling diseases.

These are some of the reasons why I am introducing into this session of Congress the bill, first introduced in the closing days of our last session, to increase the scope and opportunity of medical research through an intensified international program. I have joined with Senator LISTER HILL in this endeavor, and he is recommending, just as strongly to the Senate as I to you, that you consider it a matter of greatest importance and support the passage of the measure. The bill provides for the fullest development of the medical research potential of the whole world.

The bill further provides that this shall be done under the leadership of the National Institutes of Health of the Public Health Service. The scientists of the Institutes, as you know, have demonstrated well what can be done in partnership with the medical schools and other research centers throughout the entire United States in providing a national war against disease that is already paying off splendidly. This is being done both through the grants programs and through the high-caliber research the Institutes conduct in their own laboratories. What is not so well known, perhaps, is the fact that the National Institutes of Health has a great wealth of experience in participating in international research, its training, and interchanging scientific knowledge with others.

They work closely with WHO, with international scientific societies and research centers, and their studies and some of those supported through grants are already bringing us new and important research information from abroad. National Institutes of Health research fellows from America study in foreign countries where there is real scientific opportunity, and, even with present resources, the Institutes are bringing brilliant foreign scientists here so that we may learn from them and they from us.

Thus, I say, a National Institute of International Medical Research, working within the framework of the National Institutes of Health, the Public Health Service, and the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, can give outstanding and unique leadership to development of the whole world's research potential.

The program authorized under this measure would strengthen the research activities of the WHO and other international bodies and encourage the participation of scientists and nations around the world. It would not conflict, compete with, or duplicate with them. The amount asked to launch this new war against disease is small compared to its benefits in health, in international goodwill, and in the advancement toward peace.

The time for action is now, and recent international events only emphasize that we should not delay action in this field of humanitarian science. So I earnestly submit that we take up and pass the measure.

Let me turn now for a moment to other measures which I believe also worthy of your support. While emphasizing research, I have in my remarks also pointed out the importance of the whole world health problem and of activities derived from and related to research.

In my opinion—and that of many others, including non-Government health and medical authorities—we should also move forward upon other health fronts in addition to research.

We should strengthen and expand activities, such as those I mentioned in connection with the great problem of malaria, for the application of current medical and public health knowledge. As I indicated earlier in discussing this, there are a number of diseases which could be conquered or greatly curtailed. The knowledge is in hand, but there is not enough money, trained manpower, or facilities being provided today. Through the World Health Organization particularly, and through and with Public Health Service participation—and the Public Health Service has tremendous worldwide experience in disease prevention and control—we ought to step up the frontline warfare against disease.

Additionally, I believe that we also should support a new measure, first introduced also in the previous session, which will provide a catalytic agent—a triggering mechanism as it were—for the new international war against disease.

I refer to the measure calling for an International Health and Medical Research Year, somewhat in the manner of the International Geophysical Year. There are many areas where means for a specifically organized and directed scientific effort on an international basis would be of great value in the solution of disease and health problems.

The mechanism of an International Health and Medical Research Year would, moreover, have even greater importance and one beyond the limits of its life span.

This importance would lie in the continuing advancement that the year would make possible in relationships and patterns of collaborative effort for the furtherance of medical research and health measures in the common cause of mankind.

In closing, and again urging that we here and now declare a new world war upon disease through passage of the legislation discussed and support of intensified international health activities, I would like to hark back to the beginnings of our country. The American Revolution was an idea—an idea translated into action. It inspired people everywhere to be free. It continues to inspire them as a great historical idea that became reality and brought forth a great, free Nation.

It seems to me that we have here today a somewhat parallel matter. We have an idea—a war and revolution for health—to achieve freedom from disease. We can translate it into action and reality.

SMALL BUSINESS INVESTMENT ACT IS BEING SABOTAGED

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, 6 months have passed since Congress approved the Small Business Investment Act. Yet to date the Small Business Administration has licensed no small business investment company to operate under the act.

THE ACT IS DESIGNED FOR QUICK ACTION—BUT UNUSED

This act was designed by Congress to meet a most serious small-business problem—the problem of obtaining financing. This is a long-standing problem, but one which had by last year grown to near-crisis proportions. It was because of the need to meet the problem quickly, as well as the need to bring about a permanent solution to this problem, that the Act provided for mobilizing local, private enterprise to do the job of small business financing.

PRIVATE CAPITAL HAS TRIED TO COOPERATE

When the act was passed, the response of private enterprise was instantaneous and overwhelming. Within a few weeks trade sources reported that upward of 10,000 would-be SBI companies were knocking on the doors of the SBA for licenses, offering to invest large amounts of private funds in these enterprises. These included groups whose financial responsibility and experience are beyond question, such as national banks. But so far, none has been able to overcome SBA resistance, redtape and delay.

THE ACT CITED AS AN EXCUSE FOR VETOING AREA REDEVELOPMENT BILL

Last year when the President vetoed the area redevelopment bill—Douglas-Payne bill, S. 3683—he said that the Small Business Investment Act would meet "in part the needs of areas of severe and persistent unemployment." Areas of severe and persistent unemployment continue, as do the needs of small business for a competitive chance to bid for capital.

REDTAPE, DELAY, AND A NULLIFYING INTEREST RATE

The administration's record on this legislation has been, first, a reluctance to agree to any measure; second, insistence on a watered-down bill; third, regulations which interpret away much of the new act; fourth, a decision to set a prohibitive wholesale rate—5 percent—on such funds as it may get to lend to SBI companies for relending to small business concerns; and, up to now, a refusal to let small business have the benefits of what remains of the act.

NEW LEGISLATION IS NEEDED

It is now clear that the Small Business Investment Act should be amended to, first, provide for administration by an independent, bipartisan commission or board, rather than by an agency of the executive branch; and second, provide a way whereby private capital can be raised through the sale of securities on the national market, so as to reduce the need for appropriations. This means that a way should be provided for a sufficient spreading of the risks of the local investment companies to make the sale of such securities feasible.

I am presently drafting a bill along these lines; and I would be extremely glad to have the benefit of any suggestions any Member of the House cares to offer.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

Private American Capital Must Be Encouraged To Go Abroad

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HALE BOGGS
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, January 12, 1959

Mr. BOGGS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following remarks which I made before the National Foreign Trade Council on "U.S. Taxation of Foreign Source Income" on November 19, 1958:

In examining the subject of this discussion, I think we can accept the fact that it is the policy of the United States to promote the economic growth of the free nations of the world and to do all that is prudently possible to help the less developed nations to achieve that momentum of progress in agriculture and industry to make it possible for them to look forward to substantial economic growth. It would seem equally clear that it is the policy of our country to contribute to and assist our friends in the world to the largest extent possible by encouraging the unhampered operation of our dynamic free enterprise system.

All agree that this can best be accomplished by providing incentives for private American capital to go abroad and take with it the vitality, the skill, and the imagination that has made our system the strongest economic system in the world.

Private investment of American funds abroad is preferable to Government spending for many reasons. Not the least of which is the fact that such investment assures the most economic use of limited U.S. resources. The plain truth is that the need for capital by the free nations of the world is far larger than the amounts which our taxpayers can reasonably provide. For this reason alone private American capital must be encouraged to go abroad and take upon itself the task of preserving in the world the free system which we earnestly believe deserves to be fostered and preserved.

The foreign aid program is day by day losing favor both at home and abroad. So it becomes even more essential if we are to meet the full thrust of the Soviet economic offensive to create a favorable climate for intelligent and active free enterprise abroad. The socially conscious businessman must, in a sense, supplant the bureaucrat.

The concern of the President of the United States for the free nations of the world in this regard was most recently expressed in his address to the Colombo Plan conference. I was pleased to note the great emphasis that he placed on the necessity for encouraging private United States investment abroad. Considerations such as those underlining the President's address before the Colombo Plan conference prompted the membership of the subcommittee on foreign trade policy of the Committee on Ways and Means to announce public hearings on the subject of United States private foreign investment beginning on December 1, 1958, in Washington, D.C.

We felt the need to provide a forum in which the issues involved could be fully discussed by competent witnesses and information accumulated with which to guide possible legislative implementation of the public policies which I have alluded to. In this connection the impact of United States taxation of foreign source income is of the greatest importance, and will be of great interest to the subcommittee. We of the subcommittee have come to know as a result of our studies and travels that foreign trade policy cannot be divorced from other aspects of United States foreign economic policy. We have also been impressed with the fact that uppermost in the minds of those considering private foreign investment is the impact of U.S. tax policy on foreign source income.

Among other things the subcommittee expects that the December hearings will develop information, views and recommendations with respect to the following types of questions:

What are the facts about United States private foreign investment?

What are the reasons American capital goes abroad?

What forms does such investment take?

What are the effects of such investment on the host country?

What contribution does such investment make to the development of foreign trade with the United States and other countries?

What are the effects of such development on the economic development of underdeveloped countries?

What are the obstacles that stand in the way of new and expanding investment, both here and abroad?

What are the factors that condition the climate for investment abroad?

What is the proper concern of the U.S. Government in this field?

What types of governmental programs are appropriate in the light of our national interests?

What modifications in the tax systems of the United States as well as foreign countries are indicated?

What has been the effect of existing governmental programs in this field?

These questions are by no means the only ones pertinent to our hearings. They are merely illustrative of items of specific interest in the foreign investment field. You will agree, I am sure, that this inquiry is needed and that the findings will be helpful.

As a member of the committee of the Congress which is charged with the primary responsibility of formulating the tax laws of the United States, I am particularly aware of the need for a searching review of our revenue laws as they apply to foreign-source income. A most charitable appraisal of the Internal Revenue Code as it applies to such income would find it to be capricious in result, formalistic in impact, and difficult to administer, understand, and apply. I know no one who is familiar with taxation who does not believe that a thoroughgoing legislative overhaul is long overdue and badly needed not only as a technical matter but as a matter of policy as well. How this can best be undertaken will be one of the chief concerns of my Subcommittee on Foreign Trade Policy.

In considering ways and means to encourage private American investment abroad we must, of course, be mindful of the fiscal condition of the United States. We will begin our hearings in December at a time when the United States is facing a potential $12 billion deficit for the fiscal year 1959. If statements of some administration officials can be taken at face value, we can expect that there will be proposals during the next Congress for increasing taxes upon some segments of the domestic economy. Further, in light of recent administration pronouncements, we cannot expect the existing level of Federal expenditures to decline. Reforms here can be made, however, in my opinion, without loss of revenue. Over the long pull, there should be substantial gains in revenue from these sources. Perhaps more important than the facts of Federal fiscal life in appraising the chances for effective implementation of a policy of encouraging private foreign investment is the incomprehensible bias found in many quarters against foreign-source income. I do not understand this bias. It arises from a lack of public education, from a lack of understanding. It is not unusual to pick up a newspaper or magazine and find an article on "Foreign Tax Havens." The gist of such stories often lumps a reputable American business with modern-day Al Capones and implies, if not fraud, at least evasion of U.S. taxes.

It is in this context which we must view the possibility of providing needed incentives for the encouragement of foreign private investment. It portends an uphill fight and behooves us, if we have the interest of the United States at heart, to at least begin by considering recommendations which, though they may not go as far as we believe and know to be necessary, have a chance of adoption. There is strong evidence to support the principle of territoriality in taxing foreign source income (which would tax foreign-source income only in the country in which is situated the principal establishment to which such income is properly allocable) or at least a rate differential such as the 14-point differential considered in connection with the 1954 code. Nevertheless, it may be necessary in the light of existing conditions for organizations and individuals who are interested in spreading the doctrine of free enterprise throughout the world to consider all approaches for achieving this end in addition to those which have received prominent attention in the past. In this regard, among other things, I would think it wise for those who have skill and competence in the field of the taxation of foreign-source income to direct their attention to the proposal of deferral of U.S. tax on foreign-source income until it is severed for domestic use. This proposal has already received some attention.

You are, of course, aware of the possibilities for the deferral of U.S. taxes on foreign-source income which now exist under the Internal Revenue Code. But the benefits of such deferrals through the utilization of foreign subsidiaries or foreign-base companies are not available except at great price in many instances. The historical development of the statute and the rather fragmentary gloss which has been placed upon it by administrative and judicial interpretation has effectively denied the benefits to many companies. Consider, if you will, two companies manufacturing similar products. Company A at great risk embarked upon the unknown of foreign investment in the 1920's. The legal advice then available to it was, by present standards, poor because of lack of experience and interpretations. The attitude of the U.S. Treasury Department was then certainly far different from now. There were few regulations or rulings to guide it. Accepting the best advice available, company A organized its foreign undertaking in the form of a subsidiary incorporated in, say, Brazil. The vision of company A has been rewarded by success. The risks have proved worthwhile. The market was there. The demand for American ingenuity and products was there and company A has known for some time that similar markets existed in Argentina, Peru, South Africa, and elsewhere. One would think it a simple matter for company A to transfer a part of its hard-earned foreign-source earnings to any one of the countries named and establish a similar successful venture for the ultimate benefit of the United States and the countries involved. We know it is not.

Now take the case of company B which manufactures a product similar to that of company A. For years company B watched the experience of company A and, convinced of the wisdom of such foreign investment, decided to move into the foreign field in 1953. It established a base company and by utilizing this third country arrangement is developing the markets in, say, Argentina, Peru, and South Africa which should be available to company A as well. Its accumulated earnings and profits in any one of these countries may be transferred without the imposition of U.S. tax to the subsidiary where they are most needed. Additional benefits accrue to company B such as the averaging of foreign tax rates for the purpose of achieving the maximum benefit of the U.S. foreign tax credit. And it may achieve many tax savings on branch or other agency operations because its base company is not subject to U.S. tax jurisdiction.

Surely if we were proceeding de novo no one would suport such an inherently unequitable and discriminatory result as exists in the case of company A. Yet we today condone it by inaction and thus prepetuate precisely this situation. History is responsible for the genesis of the laws which make this result possible, of course, but they seem to be perpetuated by an overdeveloped concern for the bare possibility of tax avoidance in some cases.

I have reference, of course, to the operation of what is today known as section 367 of the Internal Revenue Code and which began in less difficult times as section 112(K) of the Revenue Act of 1932 in a campaign against foreign personal holding companies which were then being utilized for the purpose of avoiding the U.S. capital gains tax. Section 367, as you know, applies only to exchanges which involve an inherent gain and provides that, in determining the extent to which gain shall be recognized, a foreign corporation shall not be considered as a corporation for purposes of most of the important sections of subchapter C unless, before any exchange is undertaken, it has been established to the satisfaction of the secretary or his delegate that the exchange is not in pursuance of a plan having as one of its principal purposes the avoidance of Federal income tax. Of course, with tax rates what they are today it is not difficult for the Treasury Department and the Internal Revenue Service to find that a purpose of a contemplated exchange is the avoidance of Federal income taxes. Deferral is so deemed. Of course, referring again to the example, company A has no desire to avoid the payment of U.S. tax. It simply wishes to compete with equality under U.S. law with company B for foreign investment opportunities. This it cannot do because section 367 has fixed not only company A but perhaps a majority of the primary companies in the field of foreign investment in the cement of organization inflexibility. Business decisions cannot prevail and are frustrated, efficiency is denied. We are thus confronted with the absurdity of a nation that prides itself in having developed the greatest industrial and commercial complex in the world denying to its entrepreneurs the fruits of their imagination and initiative because of a reluctance to rid the Internal Revenue Code of deadwood.

Even if we were to assume that rare thing which is the Commissioner's approval of an exchange involving a foreign corporation, company A is by no means out of the woods. Subchapter C of the Internal Revenue Code was framed with domestic business problems in mind. It does not take into account the vagaries of foreign law and the policy of many foreign countries requiring a high percentage of ownership therein. Thus, even assuming that company A can overcome what is almost the irrefutable presumption of section 367 it may, nevertheless, find itself unable to invest where investment is needed because of a statute which should have as one of its principal objectives neutrality of impact between similarly situated taxpayers.

It may be that we were unaware of the existence of many of the problems confronting the businessman who wishes to invest abroad when first we framed these provisions of the Internal Revenue Code. This is no longer the case. We have been informed of the existence of the problems and the manner in which the Internal Revenue Code is distorting business decisions and preventing our American system from being carried abroad by our businessmen. We must do something about this situation.

In reflecting upon these problems to which I have so briefly alluded, I have devoted some attention to the possibilities inherent in deferral of U.S. tax on foreign source income. I have wondered why it is necessary for us to force our businessmen to seek out countries such as Liechtenstein, Monaco, and Panama to achieve a business result. I have come to the conclusion that no reason for forcing them to do so exists. It is within our power to provide the means of organizing base companies for the conduct of foreign business operations in the United States itself. We have the example of Canada's 4–K companies and Britain's overseas trade corporations. As a matter of fact we have the example of practically every other trading country in the world before us to follow.

Enactment of a law permitting the creation of a unique class of domestic corporations organized for the conduct of business abroad would achieve a great deal and do much to provide incentives to foreign investment. Such companies would be in a position to utilize the earning derived from their foreign operations for the expansion of their activities in the free countries of the world without the immediate payment of U.S. tax and would permit maximum efficiency and economy in conducting foreign business operations. Such corporations would pay U.S. tax on their foreign source income only when such income was severed from the foreign operation by a distribution to shareholders. Such corporations, and I shall refer to them hereafter as U.S. base companies for want of a better term, could and should be permitted to carry on all operations now conducted by foreign base companies. I wish to emphasize that exporting activities should in my opinion be included within permissible activities.

Provision for U.S. base companies would not in my opinion require any change in existing law providing for Western Hemisphere trade corporations. Additionally, I see no reason for not permitting any company desiring to do so to continue to operate abroad through a branch operation.

In discussing the possibilities of deferral and of establishing a special class of U.S. base companies for the purposes of achieving deferral I wish to make it clear that no member of the Subcommittee on Foreign Trade Policy or the Committee on Ways and Means has a fixed mind on the subject of how best to provide the incentive which we all believe necessary to encourage foreign investment. I have merely attempted to explore one or two proposals that have been put forward that seem to me, at this stage, to have considerable merit. If tax policy affords an appropriate device for providing incentive, and I believe that it does, we have an open mind as to how best the tax system can be utilized to provide an incentive. I welcome your advice and suggestions. I have mentioned the possibilities of deferral and the potential benefits of permitting the establishment of U.S. base companies only because I believe that deferral has been neglected in much of the thinking of people concerned with this field.

It is fair to state that the present fiscal condition of the United States should make deferral attractive to those in the executive department who are responsible for securing the revenues with which to meet the Government's bills. Deferral involves no loss of U.S. revenue since by hypothesis every dollar of foreign earnings would be subject to tax when repatriated to the United States and severed from the base operation by distribution to stockholders.

Another reason why deferral and the establishment of a special class of U.S. base companies should be considered by the Treasury Department lies in the possibilities for better administration which such companies would present to those charged with enforcing the tax laws of the United States. For example, it might be provided that such companies file an annual return setting forth the results of the foreign operation for the year. At present a foreign corporation is under no obligation to inform the United States Treasury of its operation with the result that many problems are encountered in computing the proper amount of accumulated earnings and profits from the foreign operation and the amount of foreign taxes paid and creditable. These costly administrative problems could be avoided.

From the investor's point of view the benefits to be expected from such companies are so obvious that I do not need to catalog them. Suffice it to say that not the least of them arises from the fact that the stability of United States law would be available and to a degree at least it would no longer be necessary to attempt to divine the law of a foreign country in selecting a base.

If the laws of Liberia, Luxembourg, Tangiers, and Liechtenstein pose problems of understanding for the businessman and even for legal specialists, this is understandable. After all, we expect problems when we deal with other languages and peoples of diverse customs and ways of doing business. But the paucity of information available to the American businessman contemplating foreign investment from our own Government about our law is not understandable. The regulations promulgated for the purpose of implementing those provisions of the Internal Revenue Code which provide for the taxation of foreign source income are less than full. This, along with the fact that the Internal Revenue Service has issued few public rulings in the field makes it difficult for even the tax specialist to advise in this area. Here, as perhaps nowhere else, certainty is a prime requisite. It is not fair to expect a businessman to feel his way into a situation which may rob him not only of the fruits of his foreign endeavor but of his domestic profits as well. I hope, therefore, that some attention will be devoted during the course of our hearings by both administration and public witnesses to the possibility of making more information available to the public as to the policies which are guiding the Treasury Department and the Internal Revenue Service in administering these statutes.

It has not been my purpose this afternoon to exhaust or even to mention all the tax problems confronting those engaged in foreign business activities nor even to touch on the many ways in which the tax system of the United States affects foreign operations. My purpose has been to impress you with the seriousness of my belief that something must be done, whether through the tax system or otherwise, to encourage American capital to go abroad and to make the slogan "trade not aid," meaningful. It has also been my intention to convey to you an awareness of the fact that we in the Congress of the United States know that you have problems and our sincere desire to do something about them. I would like to impress upon you the necessity of being your own advocate; to let you know that while I appreciate all that has been done by this and other organizations, which exist for the purpose of carrying our way of life abroad, that nevertheless a great deal more has to be done by you, both at home and abroad, to create an understanding of the contributions of American business not only to the United States but to the free world; and that herein lies the world's best answer to Communist imperialism.

Thank you.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ELIZABETH KEE
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, January 12, 1959

Mrs. KEE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I include a copy of my newsletter "Keenotes" issued on January 5, 1959, as follows:

KEENOTES

(By Representative ELIZABETH KEE)

I want to preface this issue of Keenotes by extending my heartfelt thanks for the hundreds of Christmas greetings and messages which I received from friends throughout the district. It will be impossible to thank each of you personally but I want you to know that I deeply appreciate your taking the time, in the midst of a busy holiday schedule, to think of me.

Your thoughts at this time of the year are comforting and inspiring. Your confidence in my ability to represent the Fifth Congressional District in Congress makes me feel proud of the trust imposed in me and grateful for the opportunity to serve you. I trust that my actions as your Representative will never lead you to the belief that I have betrayed your confidence and trust.

As our country once again enters into a new year, it is an appropriate time for me to renew my pledge to serve all the people of the Fifth District to the very best of my ability. Our country faces many grave problems. These are indeed perilous times. It is my wish for the new year that I can contribute, in some smaller manner, to the easing of the tensions which grip the world and a lightening of the burdens which our people are called upon to bear.

It is a time, too, for us as a Nation to restate our determination to carry on in a manner befitting the most powerful and wealthy Nation in history. We cannot turn our back on the rest of the world, even if we should choose such a course. History has projected the United States onto the center of the world stage. We have to keep in mind, during 1959 and the years ahead, that what we do—or fail to do—can change the course of history, that it can determine whether freedom prevails in the world.

This role of world leadership is not an easy one. Nor is it free of danger. We are facing a mighty adversary, armed with every terrible weapon known to man. We face a vigilant enemy, one who is content to work patiently over the years to have its way. Should we falter, communism could well sweep the entire world.

It is terribly expensive to develop and build new weapons and to see that nations outside the Iron Curtain are kept out of the Communist camp. No doubt we have made costly mistakes and have tried programs that were wrong.

But I firmly believe that the rest of the world is beginning to realize that our motives are unselfish. We do not want world domination or control. We desire only to create world conditions under which people can live in peace and freedom. Right now, we are the only free Nation with the substance to provide the leadership so desperately needed. I hope that in the year ahead our great country and all its people will keep this in mind.

Our people have to pay high taxes. These are burdensome. The cost of Government is high. But it would be dishonest for me to assure you, at the beginning of this new year, that the cost of Government or taxes can be substantially reduced in the year ahead. After all, it still takes about 50 cents out of every dollar paid in taxes to support the kind of defense establishments we must have.

But to say this is not to turn one's back on sincere and genuine efforts to tighten up on administration of Government, to stretch each dollar as far as it will go and to effect savings wherever possible. This is one pledge I do make for the new year—to help wherever I can to bring about sound fiscal policies.

It is not necessary, in the interest of economy, to end or stifle sound Government programs which promote the country's growth and, in the long run, help all of our citizens. For example, our area desperately needs a sound program for aiding areas with chronic unemployment. We need a sound research program to bolster the great coal industry and more research for finding new markets for farm products.

These and other things can be done within the context of a sound fiscal policy. And I pledge myself to work for them.

Nineteen hundred and fifty-nine promises to be a fateful year. I hope it will be a happy and prosperous one for all of you.

America's Answer to the Soviet Bloc's Economic Warfare

OF
HON. THOMAS B. CURTIS
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, January 12, 1959

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following remarks which I made before the International Management Division Briefing Session on "Preparing the Country for Soviet Trade Strategy in World Markets; Terms and Procedures for East-West Trade" at the Hotel Savoy-

Hilton, New York City, November 5, 1958:

AMERICA'S ANSWER TO THE SOVIET BLOC'S ECONOMIC WARFARE

At the close of the 2d session of the 85th Congress, Congressman Timothy Sheehan and I introduced identical bills to create a U.S. Trading Corporation in order to cope with the Soviet Union's declaration of war upon the United States in the peaceful field of trade. The formal declaration of war was made by Nikita Khrushchev on October 19, 1957.

We would be foolish, however, to look at this declaration of war in the field of peaceful trade as confined to the field of private enterprise trading. Indeed, in a totalitarian state there is no firm line drawn between economics and politics. It is perfectly true that economic laws cannot be repealed by political action, but it is certainly true that economic mistakes can be socialized, that is absorbed by the full society rather than born by the specific segment of the economy where the mistake has been made. Likewise deliberate economic losses may be accepted in one segment of the economy and born by the full economy in order to achieve certain defined economic or political goals of the totalitarian society. Indeed, short run economic losses may be financed by the totalitarian state in an economic sector in order to destroy competition and then have the losses recouped in the same sector by raising the prices once the competition has been destroyed. This was a familiar bit of economic strategy the United States experienced in its private enterprise sector toward the end of the 19th century and brought about the passage of the Sherman antitrust law.

I believe that a calm appraisal of the private sector of our economy will reveal that strong as some of our industries are they are not strong enough to combat the concentration of economic and political power of Soviet Russia if it is directed to their area of economic endeavor.

I also believe that it is politically naive to think that American industries when confronted with this sort of threat will fail to make their situation known to those in the political government in Washington, D.C., in order to gain assistance. Indeed, there are sufficient examples both in the past and in the present where this kind of assistance has been both sought and obtained. In the past this operation at times has extended to the ultimate—a declaration of war.

I believe it is important that assistance be granted to American industries when they are being attacked by the full weight of the Soviet totalitarian state under circumstances which we would define as unfair competition, or which I should prefer to describe as uneconomic competition. That is competition which is uneconomic to the extent that it produces economic losses which are absorbed outside the particular economic segment engaged in the competition.

However, I believe that this assistance should not be granted in camera by our Federal Government based upon no fixed set of standards or rules of procedures as is presently the case. It is entirely too easy for an industry confronted with strong competition to classify this competition as "unfair" when in actuality it is fair economic competition and all that is required is for the industry involved to look into its own internal affairs to bring about needed reforms for efficiency and increased productivity. On the other hand, it is entirely possible that an industry may not know it is being attacked or from whence it is being attacked in international trade war while the United States Government through its State Department and other intelligence sources not only can know but does know of the attack. Finally the manner in which a segment of our economy which has been placed under unfair economic attack is to be helped should be such that the competing industries within that segment can remain competitive with each other. Lack of proper standards and procedures can easily result in one competitor being favored over another within our own economy.

It is for these basic reasons that I have proposed a U.S. Trading Corporation be set up which would only come into the economic fray when certain well-defined principles of fair economic competition have been violated or are about to be violated by Soviet Russia and it would come with the fray only to keep the competition equal. Once this objective has been achieved it would retire and let competition prevail. In other words, if Soviet Russia plans to concentrate her totalitarian powers in the economic and political fields on selected areas or segments of international trade we should be ready to match such a concentration with sufficient concentration of our own economic and political powers to equalize the situation. I am satisfied if Soviet Russia knows we are set up to do this we probably will only have to demonstrate our ability to do it once or twice. That will be the end of this kind of trade war I am certain Russia contemplates.

After having introduced the U.S. Trading Act bill I have become quite disturbed about the favorable reception it has received from many prominent groups in the United States. The favorable reception has come with an accentuation on the concentration of political and economic power ensuing to the Federal Government and a minimizing, indeed an ignoring, of the basic checks I believe must accompany such a creation of power. If this power is not accompanied with strict rules setting up the circumstances under which it will apply and strict procedures for the establishment of the fact that these tests have been met, then it may indeed become a Frankenstein's monster.

I am particularly disturbed about the favorable reception this proposal has received from groups which in my opinion have viewed the Russian threat hysterically rather than realistically. I think Russia is a threat, or I would not have proposed this legislation, but I certainly do not believe it is the threat, for example, that is posed in the recent book "The Ruble War" by six top CBS news correspondents.

There are always those who will resort to "bogeyman" tactics to get through their own preconceived notions of what needs to be done to reform our society or merely to push our society ahead. For example, our regular military establishment, Army, Navy, and Air Force have found the Russian threat a very handy weapon to get appropriations out of the U.S. Congress over a period of many years. Having studied the military appropriation bills with considerable care over a period of years and the statements before congressional committees by their spokesmen as well as their public statements, I state without equivocation that there has been a deliberate and gross overplaying of Russia's military might which has damaged our own defense posture and assisted Russia in the game of bluff she has been playing with her satellites and the smaller neutral countries.

Certain groups of our scientists recently have resorted to the same tactics in order to push ahead their particular ideas of where we need more rapid scientific advancement. Just recently the most dangerous venture of all in this game of "bogeyman" has been started by some of our leaders in education. Education is the most dangerous field in which to play fast and loose with the truth. We have so much to lose. Essentially we have a system of education much superior to Russia. We can badly damage it through hysterical action instead of action stemming from healthy self-criticism. After all we have achieved something no large society has ever achieved before, a fairly close approximation of mass education. The fact that having concentrated on this goal so extensively we have somewhat neglected the important goal of quality education, should be no great cause for alarm. We seem now to be aware of the neglect and the concentration we are now making on quality should bring us into proper balance. After all the hard job was quantity and indeed quality depends upon sifting great quantities. I see no problem in having both quantity and quality education and I am satisfied we will be the first society to achieve or approximate this dual goal if we keep our heads and persevere with enlightened self-criticism.

Certainly Russia has advanced in military power, in economic power, in scientific achievement and in the field of education and it is important that we do not minimize these achievements. Indeed, it is important that we carefully appraise them. But we can do great damage, as I have suggested, by overestimating them and using this overestimation as a weapon to whip our people and the Congress into hastily conceived plans and actions. And I suggest the Congress under the lash of bogeyman techniques has badly overestimated the achievements of Russia in all of these areas.

Furthermore, it is important to see what else is happening to Russia and to the form of its society as it moves forward in economic, scientific, military, and economic achievement. Can anyone believe that these achievements can be made without changing radically the rigid and self-defeating straitjacket of political and economic communism? The straitjacket of the totalitarian state where there is no separation of economic and political powers? Can anyone believe that these achievements can be made without a separation of the powers embodied in the field of religion from those powers embodied in the field of politics and economics, no matter how hard the totalitarian state may try to hide the fact that its subjects have, as all human beings must have, a religion, a set of beliefs, a faith? As the Russian people advance in the fields of economics and education, indeed they also must advance in politics and religion and accordingly become less of a threat to a nation such as ours which is dedicated to peace through justice.

However, it is not my desire to dwell further on the subject of whether we presently are overestimating or underestimating Russia's achievements in economics, education, science, and military power. My plea is for honest appraisal of Russia's achievements. The U.S. Trading Corporation can be a bane to our society if dishonest appraisals are made of Russia's prowess, particularly her economic prowess.

Three years ago I was so disturbed about the loose talk concerning Russia's economic status and the dearth of objective information on the subject, I requested our staff of the Joint Economic Committee to have an objective appraisal made. This was done with the help of the scholars in the Legislative Reference Service of the Library of Congress and was published by the Economic Committee in 1955. This document was checked with people in and out of other sections of our Government for accuracy. Read realistically it is no cause for hysteria or the extreme statements that are constantly being made about Soviet Russia's economic development. Anymore, I might state than is the book "Soviet Professional Manpower," by Nicholas DeWitt of the Russian Research Center, Harvard University, which was published in 1955, a cause for hysteria or the extreme statements that have been made about Soviet Russia's advancement in the field of education.

I would like to revert back to the trade area. During the recent hearings by the Ways and Means Committee on the subject of the extension of the reciprocal trade agreements I asked the witnesses representing our various departments of the executive branch of Government if they did not have some suggestions for new tools they might need in the event that Soviet Russia's declaration of war in the peaceful field of trade was serious. From the State Department down through the Department of Commerce the witnesses all testified that they did not need any more powers.

I think the few cases we have had proved them to be wrong. I cited the case of Iceland, a country with population of only 160,000 people and an annual income of only $130 million based almost entirely upon the fishing industry. Under the most-favored nation clause in the reciprocal trade laws any attempt we make to treat with Iceland specially in regard to fish creates the same treatment for all other nations dealing in that fish. We have only a few weapons aside from trade treaties to assist Iceland. One is through direct aid by the U.S. Government, the other is by loans through the International Bank. These are all inadequate to keep Russia from making an uneconomic deal with Iceland to buy all her fish, absorb the economic loss in her totalitarian political economic society, in exchange for the political and military advantage of tying this strategically located island to its orbit.

Here is how the U.S. Trading Corporation could come into play. The American importers of Icelandic fish cannot meet the high uneconomic price Russia will pay to Iceland for its fish. The U.S. Trading Corporation, however, could go to them and let them bid for their customary purchases of fish and meet Russia's uneconomic price and then permit them to market the fish at their traditional margin of profit based upon what a fair competitive price for the fish would be and make up the difference between the actual cost and the fair economic cost. As I stated, I do not believe it would be necessary to meet Russia in this area very often once Russia gets the idea her tactics can be countered. Our major difficulty will be to be certain that certain countries do not play us off against a fictitious Russian play.

A second illustration is the Sudan a few years ago straddled with an unexpectedly large cotton crop. Russia was unsuccessful in her attempts to move in with uneconomic offers for this crop, but the United States was certainly limited in its ability to meet this thrust by a lack of trade weapons at her command. The U.S. Trade Corporation could have easily met the threat.

A third illustration was the threat Russia made to undersell the aluminum market of Europe. Our aluminum companies are certainly strong companies but I doubt if they could win out in an economic war with the Russian state aluminum industry if Russia really decided to make the economic sacrifice to grab this market. In this instance the U.S. Trade Corporation could meet the uneconomic selling price of Russia by making up the differential between a fair price our aluminum companies could offer their customers and the undercut price Russia was offering.

From this latter illustration I believe the dangers of abuse by our domestic companies which I referred to can be visualized. However, if we carefully set up the standards which must be met before the U.S. Trading Corporation can act and the procedures under which these standards are found to be met, then I believe this difficulty can be minimized.

I cannot leave the subject of international trade without saying a few words for my proposal for a system of flexible tariffs designed to measure economic differentials as opposed to rigid tariffs designed for protection. If we had adhered to a system of flexible tariff differentials in the past we would be in a much easier position to administer the type of U.S. Trading Corporation I am speaking about, because we would have established considerable knowledge of economic costs of production. We would have a great store of information on the techniques of political governments subsidizing and assisting the private sectors of their economies. We would have a great store of information on the techniques of cartels and state trading devices. As it is we have little information and what we have is not assembled or sorted out.

As a matter of fact, I proposed to this administration, in order to realistically grapple with the problems involved in international trade, that they sponsor legislation for the establishment of a Department of Foreign Trade in the Cabinet where all the factors which bear on the problems involved in foreign trade could be assembled instead of having them scattered through the State Department, the Departments of Commerce, Interior, Labor, and Treasury, and only coordinated by the ineffective inter-Cabinet Trade Policy Committee. I believe that world peace is inseparably bound up in the problems of international trade and that to solve these problems we must treat them with greatly increased study and attention. A Department of Foreign Trade is the way both to do it and also to dramatize its importance to our people and the peoples abroad.

The tariff is the most unrestrictive form of trade barrier among the many kinds of trade barriers that exist in international trade. Licenses, quotas, monetary exchanges, health restrictions, subsidies, etc., are the most illiberal method of restricting the flow of trade. This rests on a very simple reason; these forms of trade restrictions depend upon bureaucratic administration. The economic unit which can present and argue its case before the Bureau is the one which will win the race. This places a premium not upon economic achievement but rather upon political achievement. Economic achievement enters only to the extent that it can be proven by words and figures which the bureaucrat will believe and understand. Even then it depends upon the bureaucrat's ability to conform his administrative action to economic laws. The tariff, on the other hand, is set for all economic units to see and abide by. Once the tariff is set, the economic units are on their own to compete with each other as best they can.

It is the setting of the rate of each tariff that becomes the crucial thing, not the tariff as a device. The tariff rate should be set to measure only economic cost differentials resulting from political actions. I suggest that these cost differentials can fit a general pattern. They can be limited to those costs which result from the imposition of certain business standards by the Government for what are deemed to be good social reasons. For example, the minimum wage law imposes certain standards upon American producers because we have felt that this is good for the entire society. So we impose health regulations, fair-trade practices, antitrust laws, and a variety of other laws designed to promote the general welfare. Many of these restrictions impose costs which must be borne by our domestic producers. If we believe these social laws are important we must be ready to reflect to some degree the added costs they create in a differential tariff imposed upon foreign producers who do not have these costs. It need not be the exact cost by any manner of means, because if our social theory is correct, that the society benefits from these standards, then our producers can do a more efficient job of production than in a society which lacks these standards. The differential need only meet the margin necessary to permit fair competition with those foreign producers who have no standards or who have lower standards. The tariff rate should be flexible so it automatically goes down as the foreign producers approximate the domestic standards.

Through this process our trade would indeed become a great weapon for raising the wages and living standard of the people abroad who want to sell this produce in our great domestic market. As their living standards rise they will find that their own domestic market will increase, as we have proved already in our own economy. This will give their producers greater markets and give our producers greater markets, too.

Only by raising our minimum wages and living standards did we develop our own great domestic market. I am satisfied that in this formula of flexible differential tariffs we will find the long-range solution to the bulk of our trade problems. At the same time, we will find world peace quite close and attainable.

The Leadership of Senator Lyndon B. Johnson, of Texas

OF
HON. HUBERT H. HUMPHREY OF MINNESOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, January 12, 1959

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, we Democrats have long been proud of the high quality of our congressional leadership.

It has been constructive and responsible. It has been statesmanlike and forward-looking. It has been leadership of both vision and effectiveness.

As one member of the majority, I am proud at all times to be enrolled in the ranks led by the Senator from Texas. We may disagree upon occasion. But the occasions are few and they do not detract from the high standards of his leadership.

On January 7 the Democrats met to organize for this session. Upon that occasion, the Senator from Texas delivered an address which expressed the very highest aspirations of the American people.

Senator JOHNSON talked of peace; of our vibrant, growing, expanding country; of the problems we face—problems which are also opportunities. It was a speech of optimism; of confidence; of strength.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this able address by the Senate Democratic leader be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TEXT OF REMARKS BY JOHNSON TO SENATE DEMOCRATS

We start today a new year and a new Congress.

We have met now to transact the necessary business of our party, but I feel it would be inappropriate to proceed without acknowledging the context in which we assemble.

For us, this is the starting of a new era.

We have been given great strength. In all the long history of the Senate, never has one party won so many seats at a single election as we have won. For this, we are grateful—and certainly we are proud. Yet, we realize that our strength has never been, and is not now, the strength of numbers.

Our strength is what we are, and what we prove ourselves to be. What we hold we have earned. What we keep will be no more than what we deserve.

That is our special challenge.

Our strength will be deserving in proportion as we use it for the interests of all. By this standard, we have won the public trust; by this means, we shall honor the trust we have won.

JOHNSON SEES NEW ERA

New strength has brought us to a new era. Yet, as we note this, we cannot fail to note that this is, in much the same terms, the beginning now of a new era for our Nation, for the world, and for all humankind.

Our Nation is at the edge of what can clearly be its greatest age of expansion, growth, and abundance. Among the nations of the earth, we see emerging the first beginnings of a new age. Our times are yielding daily new capabilities for man.

The capabilities of government must keep pace with the capabilities of the people it serves. For this we know with certainty. There is no expense of government more costly or more intolerable than the burden of laggard government.

That is the work to which we come.

It is our purpose to fashion greater capabilities for our Government from the growing capabilities of man.

As Americans, not as partisans, we must acknoweldge this reality: The capabilities of our Nation and its people are, in many vital areas, now outrunning the capabilities of our Government.

There is between the people and their Government a deficit of vigor, a deficit of confidence, and a deficit of will.

Prudence requires that we bring these books into balance.

To do so, we must seek the cause rather than tilt at the symptom. The faults of men and the failings of the system must not be confused. The one will pass; the other must be removed.

Government, if it is to serve at all, must serve the future—not the present alone, and most certainly not the past.

Today the future is already the controlling fact of these times—and of the decisions we take here.

The advent of a 200 million population, a $500 billion national income, a trillion dollar economy are all near at hand.

THE PAST IS SERVED

Throughout our system, conservative men are already working with these facts.

Yet where men are responding to this future, their Government is not. The past is served—at penalty to the present and at the danger of default to the future.

It is against this danger of default that we must work.

Responsible government is responsive government. Our urgent duty—and our special opportunity—is to undertake the labors necessary to make the Government of our land responsive to the potential and the promise of the future.

What we can do now is subject to certain limits.

We have been given great strength, but not overriding strength. The executive arm of National Government remains under control of another party.

We have—by our majority here—an obligation to lead. We do not have authority to command. We have powers to advise and consent. We do not have powers to implement and accomplish.

These facts we appreciate, yet they do not matter for much beyond the confines of the Senate.

Our mandate is a mandate for confident and creative and constructive leadership—beginning now, not 2 years hence.

We shall honor the mandate.

Our opportunity—the great opportunity of this Senate—is to marshal the considerable resources of inquiry of the legislative branch to the task of defining for America new goals for the many new capabilities of its people, its economy, its technology and its national will.

We are clearly moving to a new age—an age of new standards, new accomplishments, and new potentials.

Against the promise of this new age, American industry and business is now pouring fourth billions in research to discover new capabilities.

Government, though, is moving hardly at all.

Research is under way on instruments of national security but, beyond that, little is being done. Great minds of the Nation are not being mobilized to the challenges of self-government by free men. The intellect of the Nation is not being used where it is most needed. This failing imperils us, fully as much, I believe, as would a failure to pursue research in the more obvious realms of national security.

I speak only for myself, of course, but I believe this. I believe that we should, through the resources available to us in the legislative branch, undertake the rewarding work of turning our land into the campus of the West.

We are working with the future. We are working with a new dimension—the most challenging men have ever faced.

If we are to be competent even for the routine of tomorrow, we shall need vision in our preparations—and we shall need both boldness and freshness.

We do not have it now.

It is the indictment of those who presently hold the responsibility of the action arm of our leadership that in dynamic times they have exalted—and still exalt—the static.

Free men can afford much. They can never afford the price of inertia.

Today we must face this fact: We have led the free world through a time of sickness and convalescence, but we are faced now with a well and vital world. The test of our national character and capacity will be our ability to lead a well world by our vigor and purpose as we have led a sick world by our wealth and compassion.

We need new ideas in many fields. We need to forge new tools of government.

Our controls over the monetary system are now two world wars old.

Our budget processes were formed in another day.

Our tax structure is obsolescent.

Our Government is dedicated, in many areas, to programs for which the purpose is no longer pertinent.

If we are not to default the integrity of our free enterprise system, we must concentrate vigorous effort on its future—rather than hold to easy concepts of its past.

We must not surrender to inflation.

We must not surrender to poverty.

We must not surrender to educational blight or medical mediocrity or social depression in any field of our society.

We must not abandon regions or cities or classes or ages to despair.

We must not allow the obsolescence of our ideas to foredoom vital segments of our enterprise.

We must not allow ourselves to forfeit the goals of equal standards of freedom, opportunity, and equality for want of boldness.

We certainly must not abdicate progress to the rule of tension and strife.

In a world reborn—facing the new youth of a new age and a new dimension of space—we must certainly not default the leadership of vigor to the totalitarians.

THE FIRST CONCERN

Fiscal solvency concerns us all. It is a first concern, for no course is honest without the courage of financial prudence. But we cannot afford to bankrupt the national conscience to serve the ends of political bookkeeping.

Moral integrity, as well as fiscal integrity, requires that we acknowledge deficits of will and deficits of effort and undertake a united search for responsible solutions to the problems of our times.

We, here in the Senate, have within the powers open to us under the Constitution a great opportunity to reach out across the land—into the universities and colleges, into private business, into labor, the professions, all walks of our national life—and ask great minds to come here to help us seek and search.

We can reach beyond our shores—to all the Western World and especially to our neighbor republics of this hemisphere—and ask others to share this labor with us.

We can bring men together to explore tomorrow's horizons for our land, our hemisphere, and the world.

From such explorations, we will find the facts and from the ideas with which we shall work the next decade to make government responsive to the potential of the future.

The world is in a race today that is more likely to be won by minds than missiles. We neglect this at our peril.

There is much that we must do and shall do in this session; yet, for our work, we do not come with a checklist in hand to attend only the pressing problems of the present.

We are—as are the people who sent us here—looking to the future.

We know that we shall win respect by our vision, not by our vendettas; by courage, not by carping.

Our first responsibility is responsibility itself.

The era is new. The promise is new. We work with new and growing capabilities. Yet our purpose remains unchanged. Always our party has been the party of confident men and we have drawn our strength from young and confident regions of a young and confident land.

Today there is a new youth and zest and confidence across all our land and we, in consequence, find ourselves here now as party of all the Nation.

New strength is ours. With that new strength we shall—by responsible service—add strength to our Nation, our world, and our times.

Big Brother Week

OF
HON. ESTES KEFAUVER
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, January 12, 1959

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a statement I have prepared relating to the Big Brother Week movement.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR KEFAUVER

This is Big Brother Week in Tennessee and elsewhere. I would like to emphasize the importance of adult cooperation with youngsters who need kind and constructive guidance.

The principle of the Big Brother movement is the application of the one-man—one-boy relationship to the treatment of boys who have problems which may be solved through adult direction.

Adult members of Big Brother organizations deserve our most sincere thanks for their efforts.

In my State of Tennessee, many Big Brothers associations have helped rehabilitate boys who are fatherless or who lack the guidance which a father should provide.

All Big Brothers are volunteers under the supervision of trained, professional staffs of Big Brother agencies.

The events which disturb the minds of young men are seldom public events. Most boys live in their own small world. It is a particular human relationship which sets their inner stresses and directs their actions.

During the years when I was chairman and a member of the Juvenile Delinquency Subcommittee, we had an opportunity of studying in detail the Big Brother program and we found it to be one of the most helpful programs to young people that is offered in our country. Many young people who would have become juvenile delinquents have been saved from this plight in this personal interest of a Big Brother. It is the human touch and personal interest that boys need more than anything else.

Let us join in supporting Big Brother organizations.

Remarks of Homer Thornberry Before the Democratic Caucus of the House of Representatives of the United States, 86th Congress, in Nominating Hon. Sam Rayburn as the Candidate of the Democratic Caucus for Speaker, January 6, 1959

OF
HON. CARL VINSON
OF GEORGIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, January 12, 1959

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I incorporate therein the remarks of the Honorable HOMER THORNBERRY before the Democratic caucus of the House of Representatives, 86th Congress, in nominating Hon. SAM RAYBURN as the candidate of the Democratic caucus for Speaker, January 6, 1959.

Mr. Chairman and my colleagues, I am afforded at this moment the greatest honor which has ever been bestowed on me, and that is the privilege of placing before you the name of the man who will be our candidate for Speaker and who on tomorrow will be elected our Speaker by one of the largest majorities ever given a candidate for Speaker in the history of the House.

There is little I can say here about him that is not already apparent to you, my Democratic colleagues.

Having served longer as Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States Congress than any other man and having a longer record of continuous service in the House than any other man in history, he is recognized as the superb parliamentarian and is known as the foremost legislative leader throughout the free world.

No one can equal his devotion to the Democratic Party. He has through his leadership of our party insisted that we here conduct ourselves in an orderly, responsible manner and that we provide a legislative program not only responsive to the needs of the people but also one which will deserve and receive the confidence of all of the people of this Nation. As devoted as he has been to his party, he has in every crisis in this Nation's history risen above the political and partisan differences of the moment to fight with courage for the security of our country and the enduring freedom of men, women, and children throughout the world.

He has walked with kings and notables in high places and never lost the common touch.

He has talked to crowds and never lost the simple dignity which has earned for him the affection, admiration and devotion of all of us who have the privilege of being associated with him.

I have the happy privilege and the high honor on this his birthday to place before you as our candidate for Speaker of the United States House of Representatives the name of that noble American with a thoroughbred heart, the Honorable SAM RAYBURN of Texas.

Why United States Will Not Recognize Red China

OF
HON. ALVIN M. BENTLEY
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, January 12, 1959

Mr. BENTLEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to revise and extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I wish to include the text of an article taken from a recent address by Secretary Dulles which appeared in the December 12 issue of U.S. News & World Report. The Secretary clearly restates the administration's position with regard to the recognition of Red China and the reasons behind this policy. I strongly agree with the Secretary's statements and believe that to give political recognition to the Chinese Communist regime would be truly a disheartening and almost fatal blow to the non-Communist governments in the Far East as well as a danger to the political, economic, and security interests of the United States:

WHY UNITED STATES WILL NOT RECOGNIZE RED CHINA

(Pressure is on once more for U.S. recognition of Red China. But it isn't going to happen. Secretary of State Dulles tells why in a restatement of U.S. policy.)

Developments make it ever more clear that, if we were to grant political recognition to the Chinese Communist regime, it would be a well-nigh mortal blow to the survival of the non-Communist governments in the Far East. Such recognition, and the seating of the Chinese Communists in the United Nations, would so increase their prestige and influence in the Far East, and so dishearten the free nations, that the Communist subversive efforts would almost surely succeed.

Contrary arguments come largely from two sources. There are those who argue that, since the Chinese Communist regime exists and has power in mainland China, we ought to accord it political recognition.

There is, however, no principle of international law to this effect. Recognition is a privilege which can be accorded or withheld. There are several de facto regimes in the world that we do not recognize. We act in this respect, as our national interest dictates.

The Chinese Communist regime is bitterly hostile to the United States. It is dedicated to expelling us from the Western Pacific. It is determined to take over the free peoples and resources of the area. It violates all established principles of international law and of civilized conduct.

Why should we give aid and comfort to such a regime and to such policies? Some think we should recognize the Chinese Communist regime in the hope that large and profitable trade would follow. That is an illusion. The mainland of China has never been a large customer of the United States, and its trade is even more closely regimented under Communist rule.

The United States today is exporting to the non-Communist countries of the Far East at the rate of over $2.5 billion a year. This excludes the value of military items exported under our mutual-security programs.

We may be sure that, if the Communists should take over these free nations of the Far East, our trade with them would drastically shrink, as has been the case with our trade with the Soviet Union and its European satellites. We must also recall that, because Communist nations look on trade primarily as a political instrument, it has rarely been possible for citizens of free nations profitably or safely to engage in such trade.

Should we, then, in the quest of a few millions of dollars of unreliable trade with Communist China, jeopardize exports of $2.5 billion?

We deal with the Chinese Communist regime whenever that is expedient. We do not pretend that it does not exist. We have been in almost constant negotiations with it for particular purposes, at Panmunjom, at the Geneva Conference on Indochina, in bilateral negotiations at Geneva, and now at Warsaw.

But it is certain that diplomatic recognition of the Chinese Communist regime would gravely jeopardize the political, the economic and the security interests of the United States. The Pacific, instead of being a friendly body of water, would in great part be dominated by hostile forces and our own defenses driven back to or about our continental frontiers.

There is currently a specific threat to free-world trade in the Far East. That is the "dumping" practice of Communist China. The Chinese-mainland people desperately need for themselves all that they are capable of producing. But they are denied, so that the rulers may prosecute their expansionist designs.

When millions of Chinese are dying of starvation, rice is exported for political purposes.

Goods manufactured in China are being dumped in Southeast Asia at prices that disrupt normal trade. These include textiles, bicycles, sewing machines, fountain pens, and the like. This is particularly a threat to the trade of Japan in South and Southeast Asia. This problem as it arises in the Far East is one phase of the economic offensive now being initiated by the Sino-Soviet bloc. Your Government is intensively studying this problem. We have asked business people to study it. There is no doubt in my mind but what concrete measures will be needed to assure that, in the face of this unfair competition, free enterprise will continue to play its full role as a dynamic and expanding force in developing the economies of the free-world nations.

If the non-Communist nations hold fast to policies which deter armed aggression; if they prevent subversion through economic and revolutionary processes; and, above all, if they demonstrate the good fruits of freedom, then we can know that freedom will prevail.

OF

HON. EDWIN E. WILLIS

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 12, 1959

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to explain the provisions of the bill H.R. 446, which I introduced on the first day of this session. The purpose of the proposal is simply to treat all patrons or married savers in savings and loan associations alike throughout the United States.

The present palpable inequality of treatment arises in this way. We all remember the bank and savings and loan association closures in the early 1930's. The deposits and savings of millions of our fellow citizens were snatched away from them overnight. To its everlasting glory, Congress moved forward immediately and passed two laws to prevent a recurrence of a similar financial catastrophe in the future. It first created the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, with authority "to insure the deposits of all banks"—12 U.S.C. 1811. And then Congress created the Federal Savings and Loan Corporation, with authority "to insure the accounts of all institutions eligible for insurance"—12 U.S.C. 1725.

In order to support the bank deposit insurance program, the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation Act provided for a uniform assessment on all member banks of one-twelfth of 1 percent per annum—12 U.S.C. 1817. And from the beginning of the program all bank depositors throughout the United States have in fact been treated alike, whether they come from common law States or community property States.

The Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation Act likewise provided for "a premium charge for such insurance equal to one-twelfth of 1 percent of the total of all accounts"—12 U.S.C. 1727. But unlike bank depositors, savers in savings and loan associations are not in fact being treated alike. Although savings and loan associations located in community property States pay the same and identical premiums as those located in common law States, married savers in community property States do not enjoy the same insurance protection as those coming from common law States. Under the regulations issued pursuant to the statute, married couples living in common law States enjoy insurance of the account of a husband in the sum of $10,000, insurance of the account of a wife in the sum of $10,000, and insurance of a joint account of husband and wife in the sum of $10,000; while a married couple living in a community property State receives an insurance coverage of the account of a husband in the sum of $10,000 and insurance coverage of the account of a wife in the sum of $10,000, but no insurance benefit whatever of a joint account of both husband and wife. In other words, a married couple living in a common law State enjoys an aggregate coverage of $30,000, but a married couple living in a community property State receives an aggregate coverage of only $20,000. And yet the savings and loan associations throughout the United States, in both community property and common law States, pay the same and identical insurance premiums to support the national program. This is not only inequality of treatment but rank injustice; it is as wrong as a 2-foot yardstick and as phony as a $9 bill.

This matter has received the particular attention of the executives and attorneys of savings and loan associations in community property States, of which there are eight as follows: Arizona, California, Idaho, Louisiana, New Mexico, Nevada, Texas, and Wyoming; but the savings and loan associations throughout the United States also recognize that this situation must be corrected.

A serious attempt was made to correct this inequity by having the regulations of the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation amended to provide the same amount of coverage to married savers in both common law States and community property States. The opinion of the General Counsel of the Home Loan Bank was that the desired objective could not be accomplished through amendment to the regulations, and that this would require further legislation. The Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation is a part of the Federal Home Loan Bank System.

The proposed change in the law was submitted by the United States Savings and Loan League and was included in the Financial Institutions Act of 1957, known as Senate bill 1541 of the second session of the 85th Congress. The proposed change in legislation, in substance, was adopted by the Senate last year, but the bill failed of passage in the House.

The United States Savings and Loan League at its annual convention held in Philadelphia during the month of November 1956, through its legislative committee, endorsed this amendment to the law in the following language:

> This recommendation would amend title 4 of the National Housing Act to clarify and make certain that married savers in certain community property States are provided insurance coverage on an equal basis with savers in other States.

Subsequently, Henry Bubb, chairman of the Legislative Committee of the United States Savings and Loan League, testified favorably before the Senate committee on January 30, 1957, in connection with the Financial Institutions Act of 1957, Senate bill 1451 of the second session of the 85th Congress, in submitting a recommendation that the needed change be made in the law, with the comment that the whole purpose of the proposed change was to make it clear that in community property States the husband can have $10,000 of insurance coverage, the wife $10,000 of insurance coverage, and the two of them $10,000 of insurance coverage as such persons may have in common law States.

At the 1958 convention of the United States Savings and Loan League held in San Francisco during the month of November, the legislative committee of the league adopted the following:

> The league recommends amendment to the law governing insurance of accounts to make it clear that married savers in community property States are entitled to the identical protection of married savers in other States.

The United States Savings and Loan League has a membership of some 44,000 savings and loan associations located in every State of the Union.

The community property States, eight in number, and the State leagues of the associations in each have endorsed the enactment of this amendment. The associations located in the community property States are as follows: Arizona, 17 associations; California, 235 associations; Idaho, 11 associations; Louisiana, 72 associations; New Mexico, 23 associations; Nevada, 4 associations; Texas, 203 associations; and Wyoming, 10 associations.

We do not have a breakdown of savers on a State level; however, two associations in my district at Lafayette, La., have savings accounts as follows: Lafayette Building Association, 7,400; Home Building and Loan Association, 5,600. This gives you a good illustration of the number of people interested in this legislation.

When we consider the hundreds of thousands of savers in savings and loan associations in community property States, it is easy to understand their eagerness to have the law amended to put them on a par with savers in common law States.

For many years citizens in community property States enjoyed a very distinct advantage in income tax matters over citizens in common law States. By being permitted to file separate income tax returns for the husband and the wife covering funds owned by the community, they were enabled to remain in lower brackets and thereby pay much less income tax. After many years of continuous persistent effort, the law was amended to put persons residing in common law States on the same level as persons residing in community property States. Community property States are being differentiated against purely on account of their State laws. Since the insurance of shares in savings and loan associations is on a national basis, we desire by this bill to make the same apply equally in all of the States of the Union, just as has been done in connection with income tax matters.

A copy of bill H.R. 446 follows:

H.R. 446

A bill to amend the National Housing Act with regard to insurance of accounts so as to provide uniform protection to all married savers in savings and loan associations

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section

401(b) of title IV, National Housing Act, as amended (12 U.S.C. 1724(b)), is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "Notwithstanding any other provision of law (including any law which would constitute an account community property), two persons who are husband and wife shall each be insured under this title with respect to accounts in his or her sole name in an aggregate amount not to exceed $10,000 and, in addition to any insurance under the foregoing provisions of this sentence, they shall be insured with respect to accounts in the sole names of both of them in an amount (not to exceed $20,000) such that the total of the insurance under this sentence with respect to accounts in his or her sole name and accounts in the sole names of both of them shall not exceed $30,000; and neither of them may be additionally insured under this title with respect to any account in such institution unless such insurance is authorized by this title otherwise than by this sentence."

Analysis of the Foreign Investment Incentive Bill

OF
HON. HALE BOGGS
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, January 12, 1959

Mr. BOGGS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following section-by-section analysis of the Foreign Investment Incentive Act of 1959—H.R. 5—which I introduced January 7, 1959:

SECTION 1. EFFECTIVE DATE

Section 1 provides that the bill will be applicable to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1958.

SECTION 2. FOREIGN BUSINESS CORPORATIONS

The efforts of American firms to expand their foreign investments have been seriously impeded by the adverse impact of United States tax laws. Despite the avowed policies of our Government to encourage private investment to supplement and ultimately replace foreign economic aid, the capital available for investment abroad by American corporations is unduly restricted by present tax policies. Moreover, our corporations are placed at a competitive disadvantage in their efforts to expand abroad because the tax policies of other countries do not hamper their own foreign investors.

For example, it is possible for corporations of the United Kingdom and Canada to reinvest foreign profits without payment of tax to the home country. No tax liability is imposed by either the United Kingdom or Canada until foreign earnings are repatriated. This is possible under legislation expressly enacted to achieve this result.

Because of these pressures, American corporations have been forced to organize their international operations in foreign corporations in those countries of the world whose laws permit profits earned in one foreign country to be invested in other foreign countries without an intervening tax. This unfortunate trend has developed in part because of the burden U.S. taxation imposes on the expansion of the foreign business activities of American corporations. There are frequent instances in which the management and control of American-owned foreign business have been transferred abroad to have an equal opportunity in foreign markets.

In order to eliminate the necessity for American firms to utilize these foreign corporate vehicles and to promote an expansion of foreign investment by American firms, it is proposed by section 2 of the bill to create a special category of U.S. corporations known as foreign business corporations. Section 2 would offer to American firms substantially the same tax treatment now obtained by the use of foreign corporations and would enable American firms to manage and control their international business in the United States where they belong.

Section 2 would also facilitate tax administration because the Treasury would have information received through the returns filed by these corporations. Any concern by the Treasury for an asserted loss of revenue is illusory. If the present trend to organize foreign business activities through foreign corporations continues, there will be in 5 years little U.S. revenue from taxes on foreign source income. Moreover, to the extent that private foreign investment can supplant foreign aid, there will be a net saving.

A foreign business corporation, under section 2 of the bill, is a domestic corporation which derives substantially all of its income from sources outside the United States and from the active conduct of trade or business, directly or indirectly through subsidiaries in which it has at least a 10-percent common stock interest. Income from the latter source, however, will qualify only if the subsidiary corporation derives substantially all of its income from business done outside the United States. A foreign business corporation may also license the use of patents abroad and render abroad technical, engineering, scientific, construction or like services.

Section 2 of the bill permits foreign business corporations to defer the payment of U.S. taxes on their income earned from sources outside the United States until that income is distributed. Thus, income earned in one foreign country may be reinvested in a new enterprise, in the same or another foreign country, without reduction by U.S. taxes. Similarly, income derived from licensing of patents and rendering of technical services may be accumulated and used to finance further foreign investments. It is just this tax treatment which has led so many American corporations to form foreign subsidiaries to operate their international business. The income accumulated by a foreign business corporation which is not distributed is described as reinvested foreign business income. When a distribution is made out of reinvested foreign business income U.S. tax becomes payable. Against the tax imposed, credit is allowed for taxes paid to foreign countries, just as the foreign tax credit is now allowed to prevent double taxation.

A broad definition of the term distribution is adopted in order to prevent possible misuse of foreign business corporations for tax avoidance. Since the purpose of the provision is to defer the payment of U.S. taxes only so long as the income is reinvested abroad, a distribution is defined to include any withdrawal of funds from foreign business operations. This includes the distribution of a dividend or the liquidation of a foreign business corporation. To carry out this purpose, any payment made for the acquisition of property situated in the United States, other than property that is necessary for the conduct of the foreign business, is similarly treated as a distribution, and results in the imposition of U.S. tax. The continued ownership of property that is initially acquired in connection with the foreign business activities, but which is later used in the United States for other purposes, is also treated as a distribution.

The advantages of the foreign business corporation provisions are meaningful only to American firms interested in the expansion of their foreign business. Moreover, these provisions will prevent tax avoidance which has sometimes arisen in the use of foreign corporations. A foreign business corporation cannot qualify if it holds stock in subsidiary corporations which derive any substantial amount of income from investments in the United States. Money cannot be accumulated abroad and then loaned, for example, to the parent organization. Nor can such money be used to purchase plants and equipment in the United States for lease to the parent corporation.

It cannot fairly be contended that section 2 of the bill would make the United States a tax haven. A corporation organized in a foreign country need never pay U.S. taxes on earnings from from non-U.S. sources. On the other hand, a foreign business corporation organized in the United States will pay U.S taxes on foreign income when distributed. Furthermore, ordinary income taxes will be imposed even if the foreign business corporation is liquidated, whereas a corporation organized in a foreign country can be liquidated subject only to capital gains taxes.

SECTION 3. TRANSFER AND REORGANIZATIONS TO FACILITATE PRIVATE FOREIGN INVESTMENT

As presently administered by the Treasury Department, section 367 constitutes a deterrent to increased private foreign investment because of a strict interpretation of the term "avoidance of taxation" in situations involving the transfer of property from a U.S. corporation to a foreign corporation to be used in the active conduct of a trade or business abroad.

Where such a transaction involves the transfer or exchange of assets which may have appreciated in value, the taxpayer must, before completing the transaction, obtain a ruling from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that such exchange is not in pursuance of a plan having as one of its principal purposes the avoidance of Federal income taxes.

Since tax rates in some foreign countries are presently lower than rates prevailing in the United States, the commissioner frequently finds an ominous purpose in a contemplated transaction, and rules that the transaction would be an avoidance of Federal income tax. Indeed, the Treasury Department views any deferral of tax as avoidance of tax.

Section 3 of the bill would facilitate private foreign investment by making expressly applicable to transfers of business property for foreign investment the usual rules for nonrecognition of gain otherwise provided in the code for corporate reorganizations. To accomplish this result, the bill provides that transfers of foreign business property are not for the purposes of tax avoidance and, hence, eliminates the necessity for an advance ruling from the Internal Revenue Service. The term "foreign business property" is strictly defined to include only property actually used in a trade or business, or stock of another corporation actively engaged in a trade or business. The trade or business must be one 90 percent or more of the gross income of which is derived from sources outside the United States.

To conform related provisions of the code, section 1492 is also amended to provide that the excise tax imposed by section 1491 shall not apply where stock or securities transferred to a foreign corporation are foreign business property as defined in section 367(c).

SECTION 4. EXTENSION OF WESTERN HEMISPHERE CORPORATION STATUS TO INTERNATIONAL TRADE CORPORATIONS

Since 1942 a class of corporations known as Western Hemisphere trade corporations has been taxable at a rate 14 percentage points lower than the normal tax and surtax rates applicable to other corporations. This has been accomplished by allowing a deduction to such Western Hemisphere trade corporations under section 922 of the 1954 code. Western Hemisphere trade corporation status, under existing law, is limited to a corporation which does all of its business—except for incidental purchases—in any country or countries of North, Central, or South America, or the West Indies, provided its income meets two conditions:

First. At least 95 percent of gross income for a 3-year period must be derived from sources without the United States; and second, at least 90 percent of gross income for a 3-year period must be from the active conduct of a trade or business.

The principal purpose of section 4 is to extend the tax status now enjoyed by Western Hemisphere trade corporations to domestic corporations doing business in any foreign country, if the conditions respecting kind and source of income—as somewhat modified—are met.

The justification for enactment of the Western Hemisphere trade corporation provisions in 1942 was that American corporations trading in foreign countries within the Western Hemisphere are placed at a considerable competitive disadvantage with foreign corporations. See Senate Report No. 1631, 77th Congress, 2d session, page 32. Since the same competitive inequity now exists throughout the free world, it is only fair that all U.S. corporations engaged in foreign trade should be treated alike.

The rate differential for the new International Trade Corporation provided by section 4 is fully as justifiable for corporations doing business in Pakistan as in Peru, in Burma as in Brazil, and in the East Indies as in the West Indies. Under section 4, only 90 percent—instead of 95 percent as under existing law—or more of the gross income must be derived from sources without the United States. The reason for this change is the fortuitous possibility that nonrecurring income from within the United States (for example, interest on a tax refund) may result in disqualification for as many as 5 years.

In computing the 90 percent or more of gross income derived from the active conduct of a trade or business, there would be taken into account compensation for technical, managerial, engineering, construction, scientific or like services, royalties from patents, trademarks, and copyrights, and dividends when received from a corporation which, itself, meets the conditions as to kind and source of income, if the stock ownership by the corporation receiving such income is at least 10 percent. The justification for broadening the latter definition is the recognition that foreign countries often require local incorporation and that frequently the risk to American capital is so great as to make essential the sharing of the stockownership.

Under section 4 of the bill, Western Hemisphere trade corporations will cease to exist for taxable years beginning after December 31, 1958, and for all subsequent taxable years such corporations will qualify as international trade corporations. No corporation which meets the present requirements of the Western Hemisphere trade corporation provisions will fail to qualify as an international trade corporation. International trade corporations will be permitted to file consolidated returns in the same manner and on the same basis as consolidated returns may be filed by Western Hemisphere trade corporations under existing law.

SECTION 5. ALTERNATIVE LIMITATION ON FOREIGN TAX CREDIT

Under existing law, domestic corporations, and citizens and residents of the United States, are subject to U.S. tax on total income from sources within and sources without the United States. Since income from without the United States is generally also subject to income tax in a foreign country or possession, a credit is allowed against the U.S. tax for these taxes in order to avoid double taxation of such income.

The foreign tax credit, however, is restricted by the so-called country-by-country limitation, so that the credit for foreign taxes paid to a foreign country cannot exceed the same proportion of the taxpayer's total U.S. tax liability before credit which the taxable income from that country bears to taxable income from all sources. The net effect of this limitation is that the credit for foreign taxes paid to a particular country cannot exceed the amount of the U.S. tax on taxable income from that country.

Thus, under existing law, if a taxpayer earns $100,000 in each of two foreign countries—country A, in which the tax rate is 60 percent, and country B, in which the tax rate is 40 percent, the corporate tax paid, respectively, would be $60,000 and $40,000. Since the income from each country is taxable in the United States at the rate of 52 percent, the total U.S. tax prior to the foreign tax credit is $104,000. Since the $60,000 paid to country A exceeds the $52,000 of U.S. tax on income from country A, the excess of $8,000 is not allowable as a foreign tax credit, even though the tax paid to country B is $12,000 less than the ratable part of the U.S. tax on the income from country B. Consequently, a taxpayer in such circumstances would pay an aggregate tax of $112,000 on a total income of $200,000, whereas a corporation earning the same income from less hazardous enterprises within the United States would pay a total tax of $104,000.

Section 5 of the bill would provide for an alternative limitation upon the foreign tax credit to insure that the $8,000 of credit for tax paid to country A, which would be lost under existing law, could in effect be applied against U.S. tax upon income from other foreign countries. In no event, however, could the total of the credit for taxes paid to all foreign countries exceed the ratable part of the U.S. taxes upon total taxable income from all sources without the United States. In this manner the fundamental purpose of the foreign tax credit—to prevent double taxation of income earned abroad—which has been a basic cornerstone of Federal tax policy since 1918, would be effectuated.

SECTION 6. CREDIT FOR INVESTMENT INCENTIVE WAIVERS OF TAX BY A FOREIGN COUNTRY

This section will make it possible for American firms which do business without the United States to benefit from tax inducements offered by foreign governments to attract new capital, new technical skills, and American management. Today, if a foreign country is willing to give up tax revenues to induce an American firm to risk its capital and to provide the technical skills and know-how for industrial development, such a concession is of no benefit to the American concern. Under U.S. tax laws, income from foreign sources is fully taxable, but a credit against the U.S. tax is allowed for income tax paid to a foreign country. When a foreign country reduces its tax, the U.S. tax is correspondingly increased. Hence, any benefit of such a tax inducement is vitiated under existing tax laws.

It is not justifiable to thwart the efforts of underdeveloped countries to increase their standard of living through industrialization which cannot be provided without capital from the United States. Frequently, these underdeveloped countries are not firmly committed to either the Soviet bloc or the free world. Our national interest lies in assisting these countries in their efforts to industrialize and in impressing them with the advantages of our economic system. It is difficult to explain that tax sparing, their best opportunity for acquaintance with the free-enterprise system, is nullified by U.S. tax law.

While tax sparing is a worthwhile instrument, its scope must be limited. Safeguards are provided in section 6 by requiring that the taxpayer establish to the satisfaction of the Secretary of State that tax waivers were not only extended in good faith by the foreign country, but were also accepted in good faith by the U.S. taxpayer, and that the taxpayer was, thereby, induced to begin, increase, or continue the specified activity within the foreign country. In view of the foreign economic policy aspects of this provision, the Secretary of State is considered best qualified to make the determination under this section, just as the defense agencies have usually been delegated authority to issue certificates of necessity for accelerated amortization.

The period of credit for taxes spared is limited to 10 years.

SECTION 7. NONRECOGNITION OF GAIN ON INVOLUNTARY CONVERSION OF PROPERTY OF FOREIGN SUBSIDIARIES

Under existing law, if the property of a domestic corporation is compulsorily or involuntarily converted as a result of its destruction, theft, seizure, requisition, or condemnation, no gain is recognized by such corporation upon the receipt of insurance proceeds, if these proceeds are converted into property within 1 year after the close of the first taxable year in which any part of the insurance proceeds is received. However, this treatment does not extend to the case where a domestic corporation insures the property of its wholly owned foreign subsidiary with the result that, when the property of the foreign subsidiary is destroyed, for example by fire, the domestic parent pays a tax on the insurance proceeds received as a result of the fire at ordinary income rates.

In many foreign countries it is impossible or difficult to secure adequate insurance coverage. It is necessary for a domestic corporation to seek insurance from U.S. sources in order to protect the assets of its foreign subsidiary. Thus, such domestic corporations are deprived of the benefit of the insurance protection by the operation of existing law to the extent that the insurance proceeds are reduced by the full corporate income tax when they are received. To prevent this result, section 7 of the bill extends the nonrecognition of gain now provided by section 1033 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to cases where property of a foreign subsidiary in which the taxpayer has an insurable interest is compulsorily or involuntarily converted, if the taxpayer, first, contributes the insurance proceeds to the capital of the foreign subsidiary; or, second, purchases property similar or related in service or use to the property involuntarily converted and contributes such property to the capital of the foreign subsidiary. This rule applies whether or not the contribution of insurance proceeds is in exchange for stock. It also applies to cases where a contribution to capital is directly to the subsidiary, or indirectly through another foreign subsidiary. To prevent a double benefit to a domestic corporation as a result of the new treatment provided by the bill, section 7 specifies that the domestic corporation's basis of the foreign subsidiary's stock shall be increased only by the amount of any gain which is recognized. Similar safeguards are provided by section 7 to prevent a distortion in the earnings and profits of the foreign subsidiary. Thus, since the foreign subsidiary would be allowed a deduction in the amount of this loss arising from the involuntary conversion of its property, the bill provides that its earnings and profits are to be increased by the amount of the gain which is not recognized by the domestic parent corporation as a result of the new treatment provided by the bill.

United States Trading Corporation

OF
HON. THOMAS B. CURTIS
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 12, 1959

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I am reintroducing a bill to establish a United States Trading Corporation in order to meet the challenge of attempted Soviet penetration of world markets. This bill is not designed as a final and complete bill, but is mainly for the purpose of having it referred to the Congress so that the proper congressional committees and their staffs will get to work on this problem which the United States and the free world have to face at the present time. If this bill will be but a start toward a program which will enable the capitalist free world to properly compete with the Soviet economy, our purpose in introducing this bill at the present time will be achieved.

It is estimated that the economy of the Soviet Union, although not comparable to ours in total capacity or total production at the present time, is growing at a rate roughly twice that of ours. Allen Dulles, Director of the Central Intelligence Agency, has described the Kremlin's progress in that respect as "the most serious challenge ever faced by the United States in times of peace"—a challenge making it "most probable that the fateful battles of the cold war will, in the foreseeable future, be fought in the economic and subversive arenas." Certainly, this is but another indication to prove that we should be well on our way toward making battle plans for the economic war.

There was a recent State Department report which labeled the Russian communistic tactics of economic aid and economic policy as being even more dangerous to the free world than the threat of war. We all know, in studying Marxism and communism, that it was the feeling of the founders of the philosophy of communism that ultimately capitalism would fail, and this would make it easy for socialism and communism to take over. However, we must not fall into the trap of adopting the Communist policies. We must be in a position to aid and help individual business enterprises and the capitalist system, so there will be no encroachment by government on free business; but, because of the economic war against the Communists, it makes it necessary that private enterprise and Government march together in this warfare rather than apart.

In recent months, we are getting a new insight into this trade warfare policy and we can cite the example shown us in the aluminum industry. Until recently, North American exports of aluminum to European countries provided practically all of the imports of this metal to the free European countries. Just a short time ago, Russian Communist sources announced to various European aluminum purchasers that they would supply aluminum for approximately 1.7 cents per pound cheaper than it could be bought from American and Canadian sources. In other words, the Communists were not worrying about costs, knowing they have slave labor and a Socialist economy where material costs are not measured in monetary value, enabling them to sell raw material or finished products at any price they arbitrarily choose. Our American and Canadian firms cannot meet that type of competition. Are we to idly stand by while we lose those markets and our own continent has to suffer from such competition? Some methods must be found to combat this type of competition in aluminum and surely in many other products, and the operating procedures of meeting this problem must immediately be given a great deal of study.

In setting up the United States Trading Corporation, there will be losses entailed. If we are to compete with the Russian Communist bloc, the Government might have to purchase raw materials and finished products from our concerns and sell at a loss in order to vie with their slave economy. We can possibly see a time when the original capital of the Corporation might be used up, at which time the Corporation would again have to come back to Congress to receive further monetary support. At that time, the Congress would be in a position to evaluate the work and accomplishments of the Corporation, and then could decide whether the program was worth continuing or should be changed.

In the long run, the economic facts of life are bound to catch up with the inhuman and unprogressive economic system of communism. However, in the interim, such a system can badly damage, indeed like the parasite plant can destroy, the healthy and sound economic system of a free society. Just as in our own internal economy we have found that unrestrained monopolistic practices can damage the healthy growth of our own economy so must we recognize that these same practices engaged in world trade can badly damage healthy foreign trade.

In other words, Russia through its state trading can pick and choose specific areas for attack, undersell the market for whatever period of time is necessary to destroy competition and then once competition has been destroyed revert, in true monopolistic form, to increased prices to recoup the economic loss suffered in gaining the market and then go on to exploit the market and, worse still, enslave small nations dependent upon a narrow economic base.

Strong as our private businesses are, they are not strong enough to cope with this kind of operation. Accordingly, the United States Trading Corporation would be set up to respond when this kind of economic warfare becomes apparent.

In putting meat on the bones of the bill I have proposed, it will be necessary to spell out in definite terms the economic circumstances which will permit the Corporation to function. As I have stated, it would be only in answer to a clear threat by Soviet Russia resorting to state trading and monopolistic practices designed to destroy competition or enslave small nations.

If Soviet Russia does not engage in this kind of activity, the Corporation would not have to act. If Russia does, the Corporation would be there to insure the fact that through temporary underselling, though it lasts for several years, Russia could not take over any market and destroy healthy competition, or enslave the economy of some small and weak nation.

There is no question in our minds that affirmative action and positive planning must take place now. We can compete against the Russian declaration of economic war only by intelligence and cooperation. The bill which we are introducing and which would create the United States Trading Corporation is but a step to get a workable program started.

In conclusion, I want to reiterate that we do not want our Government to take over business. We want a program in which the Government will assist private business, and only take over such functions as would be necessary in order that private enterprise and free government can march down the road of economic warfare together, and ultimately foil the aim of communism to dominate the world.

The bill I am introducing is as follows:

A bill to establish a United States Trading Corporation to meet the challenge of attempted Soviet penetration of world markets, and for other purposes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "United States Trading Corporation Act."

SEC. 2. The Congress recognizes that one of the most dangerous weapons currently being employed by the Soviet bloc in its struggle for world domination is the use of international trade to achieve that objective through economic means. If the United States is to continue to be the leader of the nations of the free world in their effort to resist and retard such domination by the Soviet bloc, it must prepare to utilize international trade as an instrument of our national policy. So that this may be done in the most effective manner with the greatest possible benefit to the United States and its citizens and the other free nations and their citizens there is hereby established a body corporate to be known as the "United States Trading Corporation" (hereafter in this Act referred to as the "Corporation") which shall assist and supplement the efforts of private business in the United States in fostering trade between the United States and the other nations of the world.

SEC. 3. The Corporation shall have its principal office in the District of Columbia and may establish offices in such other places as it may deem appropriate in the conduct of its business.

SEC. 4. The objects and purposes of the Corporation shall be to undertake such measures, and engage in such activities, with respect to the foreign trade of the United States as will effectively meet the threat to the free world of long-range economic penetration of world markets by the Soviet bloc. In connection with and in furtherance of its objects and purposes and the policy of the Congress set forth in section 2, the Corporation is empowered—

(1) to adopt, alter, and use a corporate seal which shall be judicially noticed;

(2) to adopt, amend, and repeal bylaws governing the conduct of its business and the performance of the powers and duties granted to or imposed on it by law;

(3) to sue and be sued in its corporate name in any court of competent jurisdiction;

(4) to determine the character of and the necessity for its obligations and expenditures and the manner in which they shall be incurred, allowed, and paid, subject to laws specifically applicable to Government corporations;

(5) to acquire, in any lawful manner, any property (real, personal, or mixed, tangible or intangible), to hold, maintain, use and operate the same, to pledge, hypothecate, sell, exchange, or otherwise dispose of the same, whenever any of the foregoing transactions are deemed necessary or appropriate to the conduct of activities authorized by this Act or to achieve the objectives set forth in section 2, and on such terms as may be prescribed by the Corporation;

(6) to execute all instruments necessary or appropriate in the exercise of any of its functions;

(7) to use the United States mails in the same manner and under the same conditions as the executive departments of the Federal Government;

(8) to assist citizens of the United States or any corporation at least 60 per centum of the stock of which is owned by citizens of the United States which is engaged in foreign trade and is determined by the Corporation to be achieving the objectives set forth in section 2 by loan, subsidy, or otherwise;

(9) to appoint such agents, attorneys, and employees as may be necessary for the conduct of the business of the Corporation; and to delegate to them such powers and to prescribe for them such duties as may be deemed appropriate by the Corporation; and

(10) to take such actions as may be necessary to achieve the objectives set forth in section 2, and to carry out the powers and duties granted to or imposed on it.

SEC. 5. The Corporation, including its franchise, its capital, reserves, surplus, and income, shall be exempt from all taxation (which shall, for all purposes, be deemed to include sales, use, storage, and purchase taxes) now or hereafter imposed by the United States, or any Territory, Commonwealth, or possession thereof, or by any State, county, municipality, or local taxing authority, except that any real property (or buildings which are considered by the laws of any State to be personal property for taxation purposes) of the Corporation shall be subject to State, Territorial, Commonwealth, county, municipal, or local taxation to the same extent according to its value as other real property is taxed.

SEC. 6. (a) There shall be a President of the Corporation, who shall be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who shall serve as the chief executive officer of the Corporation. There shall be a Vice President of the Corporation, who shall be appointed by the President of the United States by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, who shall serve as President of the Corporation during the absence or disability of or in the event of a vacancy in the office of President of the Corporation, and who shall at other times perform such functions as the President of the Corporation may from time to time prescribe.

(b) The annual rate of compensation of the President of the Corporation shall be $21,000, and the annual rate of compensation of the Vice President of the Corporation shall be $20,500.

SEC. 7. (a) The Corporation shall be managed by a Board of Directors of the Corporation. The Board of Directors of the Corporation shall consist of the President of the Corporation who shall serve as Chairman, the Vice President of the Corporation who shall serve as Vice Chairman, and fifteen additional persons appointed by the President of the United States by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Of the seventeen members of the Board of Directors not more than nine shall be members of the same political party. Before entering upon his duties, each of the directors shall take an oath faithfully to discharge the duties of his office. Terms of the directors shall be at the pleasure of the President of the United States, and the directors, in addition to their duties as members of the Board of Directors, shall perform such additional duties and may hold such other offices in the administration of the Corporation as the President of the Corporation may from time to time prescribe. A majority of the Board of Directors shall constitute a quorum. The Board of Directors shall adopt, and may from time to time amend, such bylaws as are necessary for the proper management and functioning of the Corporation, and shall, in such bylaws, designate other officers of the Corporation and prescribe their duties.

(b) Members of the Board of Directors (other than the Chairman and Vice Chairman) shall receive compensation at the rate of $20,000 per annum.

SEC. 8. (a) There shall be an Advisory Committee of the Corporation consisting of 9 members, appointed by the Board of Directors of the Corporation on the recommendation of the President of the Corporation, who shall be broadly representative of production, commerce, agriculture, and labor. The Advisory Committee shall meet one or more times per year on the call of the President of the Corporation, to advise the Board of Directors on the program of the Corporation.

(b) Members of the Advisory Committee, while attending meetings of the Advisory Committee called by the President of the Corporation, shall be entitled to receive compensation at a rate to be fixed by the President of the Corporation, but not exceeding $50 per diem, and while away from their homes or regular places of business they may be allowed travel expenses, including per diem in lieu of subsistence, as authorized by law for persons in the service of the Federal Government who are employed intermittently.

SEC. 9. (a) The Corporation shall have a capital stock of $1,000,000,000 subscribed by the United States. Payments under this subsection of the subscription of the United States to the Corporation and the repayments thereof shall be treated as public debt transactions of the United States. Certificates evidencing stock ownership of the United States in the Corporation shall be issued by the Corporation to the Secretary of the Treasury.

(b) The Corporation is authorized to issue from time to time notes, debentures, bonds, or other obligations which shall be purchased by the Secretary of the Treasury; but the aggregate amount of such obligations outstanding at any one time shall not exceed $4,000,000,000. Such obligations shall be redeemable at the option of the Corporation before maturity in such manner as may be provided for in such obligations and shall have such maturity as may be determined by the Board of Directors of the Corporation with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. Each such obligation shall bear interest at a rate determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, taking into consideration the current average rate on outstanding marketable obligations of the United States as of the last day of the month preceding the issuance of the obligations of the Corporation.

(c) For the purpose of purchasing capital stock and obligations of the Corporation issued under this section the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to use as a public debt transaction the proceeds from the sale of any securities issued under the Second Liberty Bond Act, as amended, and the purposes for which securities may be issued under such Act, as amended, are extended to include any purchase of capital stock or obligations of the Corporation issued under this section.

SEC. 10. No director, officer, attorney, agent, or employee of the Corporation shall in any manner, directly or indirectly, participate in the deliberation upon or the determination of any question affecting his personal interests, or the interests of any corporation, partnership, or association in which he is directly or indirectly personally interested.

SEC. 11. The President of the Corporation in carrying out his functions shall consult from time to time with the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Commerce, and the President of the Export-Import Bank of Washington.

Federal Assistance to Education

OF
HON. STUYVESANT WAINWRIGHT
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, January 12, 1959

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege today to introduce one of two bills carrying out the administration program to strengthen American education. These bills properly recognize a national concern for our educational system by providing Federal assistance in meeting two of the most critical problems confronting our schools and colleges.

The first bill, introduced by Representative FRELINGHUYSEN, would remedy the plight of needy school districts which do not have the financial resources to overcome their classroom shortages on their own. It would enable such communities to construct up to $3 billion worth of new classrooms in the next 5 years.

Over the same period, my bill would help colleges and universities accelerate $2 billion worth of construction of additional academic and housing facilities which will be needed to accommodate the ever-increasing numbers of able boys and girls who will reach college age in the next few years.

Many colleges and universities, both public and private, are presently unable to finance the construction of additional classrooms, laboratories, and dormitories which must be built now to provide facilities for the tremendous enrollment increases expected in the decade ahead. It is a matter of national interest to assure that the opportunity for higher education will remain available to all able young men and women who seek it in the years to come.

Introduction of Bill To Equalize the Pay of Retired Members of the Uniformed Services

OF
HON. JOHN F. BALDWIN, JR.
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, January 12, 1959

Mr. BALDWIN. Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday, January 7, 1959, I introduced a bill H.R. 703, which has for its purpose the reestablishment of the relationship between retired pay and the active duty pay of members of our uniformed services.

It will be remembered by Members of the House that, when the Military Pay Act of 1958 (Public Law 85–422) was enacted last year, it departed from the long-established policy that retired pay of previously retired personnel of the uniformed services be computed on the same basis as that of personnel thereafter retired.

The failure of the new pay law thus to keep faith with those who have served our country so well in war and peace has resulted in disillusionment among both active and retired personnel of the services. It has dealt a blow to what, in the past, has been the greatest single incentive to tenure in military service. If this mistake is left uncorrected, it alone may nullify the very purpose of the law itself, namely, to improve the stability of career military service and to stem the exodus from such service of our best qualified personnel.

As pointed out by the Cordiner Committee report, military retirement is a unique form of retirement, possessing characteristics not found in any other form of retirement. Career retired personnel of our uniformed services continue to hold office after retirement. They may be, and frequently are, involuntarily recalled to active service. They are, thus, not free agents, as are those who retire under other systems. Further, there is always a definite ceiling over their potential in reward for their service—a ceiling which we here in Congress place over them in a succession of pay laws for all to read. Until the enactment of the Military Pay Act of 1958, they could, at least, have faith that their Government would adhere to well-established standards governing their retirement rights.

Among other things, in recognition of these principles, the Cordiner Committee reported as follows:

> The committee has therefore concluded that the incentive value of its existing military retirement program depends to a major degree upon its integral relationship with active duty compensation and the confidence which has been built up in the military body that no breach of faith or breach of retirement contract has ever been permitted by the Congress and the American people. It is this unique characteristic which serves to counterbalance many of the limited aspects of the military retirement pay and has made it one of the most influential selling points in the recruitment efforts of the services.

Editorials have appeared in leading newspapers and periodicals throughout the Nation, urging a correction of the error which has been made. Among them are the New York Times, the Washington Star, and the authoritative spokesman of the military services, the Army-Navy-Air Force Journal. One quotation from the New York Times should be looked upon as prophetic:

> Young officers who might make the services a career will not be blind to this discrimination; if officers already retired can thus be discriminated against in the interests of false economy, this can happen again.

The legislature of my own State of California petitioned Congress to maintain the time-honored policy in regard to the retired pay computation of previously retired personnel of the services—CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 104, part 5, page 5876.

The relatively modest cost of retired pay maintenance, as compared to the high costs of the newly created incentive features, provided in the Military Pay Act of 1958, is small, indeed, to the replacement costs which will inevitably result from the defections from career military service of those who, unless we restore their confidence, will leave the services. Faced with the assurance that their retired compensation will be progressively reduced, the best and most alert officers may seek other careers, unless we act now. Even worse, necessary replacements for those who thus leave the services might well result in the substitution of less qualified personnel for the best qualified of our fighting men.

In the face of this dire threat to our national safety, I am sure that Members of the House will wish speedily to correct the mistake we have made by reestablishing equality of treatment in retired pay compensation among members of the uniformed services. That is what my bill, if enacted, will accomplish.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ELIZABETH KEE
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, January 12, 1959

Mrs. KEE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRES-SIONAL RECORD, I include copy of my newsletter "Keenotes," issued today, as follows:

KEENOTES

(By Representative ELIZABETH KEE)

The opening of a new Congress is always an inspiring occasion. On January 7, 1959, I was privileged for the fourth time to be on hand for the time-honored ceremonies which date back to the founding of our beloved country. Legislative veterans, men who have served as many as 15 or 20 terms, tell me that regardless of the number of times they have participated in these ceremonies, they are always thrilled and humbled.

The oath of office, administered every 2 years, is always a reminder of the great honor it is to serve in the House of Representatives. Nothing can make one more humble than to realize that, as a Member of the House, he must speak and act for thousands of his fellow citizens. It is a responsibility that simply cannot be taken lightly.

When the 86th Congress convened at 12 noon on January 7, the country embarked upon what promised to be one of the most eventful periods in history. You will recall that in January of 1958, when lawmakers returned to Washington for the 2d session of the 85th Congress, our country was facing the threat posed by the Russian conquest of space. Greeting the new Congress this year were further Russian achievements, notably the lifting of a tremendous missile out of the range of the earth's gravitational pull and placing it in orbit around the sun.

This fact places squarely before Congress one of the most pressing problems it must face. How are we doing in the race with Russia for conquest of space? Here we are dealing with a highly complex and technical question. None of us are experts, but all of us can, I am convinced, detect a sense of uneasiness on the part of the people and a feeling that perhaps we are not doing as well as we should.

This year both the House and the Senate have permanent committees on outer space. We are in a much better position to deal with this problem than we were last year. One of the first orders of business will be for the space committees to take a look at what we have done—which is considerable, incidentally—and try to spur the executive department on to greater effort and achievement.

Also facing the 86th Congress is a tremendous national debt and the outlook for a further deficit during the fiscal year ending on June 30. The business recession brought about the deficit. Tax revenues from both business and individuals took a sharp dive. Yet the Government had to step into the breech in certain areas—and this cost money. I am convinced that without extension of unemployment insurance benefits and other positive antirecession measures voted by Congress, the recession would have deepened. We are making good economic recovery. No doubt tax revenues will greatly increase during the year.

There will be a battle over the budget. Democrats have been classified as spenders. But I hazard the guess that the coming months will see an exhibition of fiscal responsibility by the Democrats that has been unequaled in recent years. Our record on this score during the 85th Congress was outstanding. Remember, we increased defense appropriations but reduced the overall budget by about $600 million.

Many people are worried about our defenses. They feel we are permitting the Russians to narrow the gap and threaten the superiority which we still retain on an overall basis. I am sure Congress will insist that we not skimp on defense. After all, money saved at the expense of national security is not true economy.

Washington Report

OF
HON. BRUCE ALGER
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 12, 1959

Mr. ALGER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include my weekly newsletter to constituents for January 10, 1959.

The newsletter follows:

WASHINGTON REPORT

(By Congressman BRUCE ALGER, Fifth District, Texas, January 10, 1959)

"I do solemnly swear that I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion and that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office on which I am about to enter. So help me God." (The oath.)

Thus, for 436 Representatives (including 17 women) began the 2-year 86th Congress. There were many new faces. Republicans totaled 153 (down from 200), Democrats 283 (up from 235). The opening prayer of House Chaplain Braskamp fittingly ended with a united Lord's Prayer. Meanwhile, in the other body (Senate), Chaplain Harris included "Grant us the art of disagreeing without being disagreeable."

No. 206, Old House Office Building, is the Texas Fifth District, Dallas County, headquarters. The staff is the same—Frank Crowley, Mary Hornbeck, Dorothy Chrest, Kay Wharton—an able and unique group—unique in two ways—representing one of the Nation's largest districts and in being the original staff.

The 44th Congressman in history to be House Speaker, SAM RAYBURN, Texas, was again elected by the Democratic majority in a straight party line vote; while Republicans replaced JOE MARTIN, Massachusetts, with CHARLES HALLECK, Indiana, as minority leader. The determining factor in this contest was leadership, not political philosophy since both are conservatives.

The state of the Union message was well presented by the President (he looks fine) to the joint Houses, Supreme Court, Cabinet, Chiefs of Staff, and diplomats. Worldwide in scope, it was too general for detailed programs. These will follow. The theme was "security plus liberty."

Some of the references made are most important and thought-provoking, including: liberty and the God-given rights of man; world suspicion and tension; mass destruction possible; keeping the peace requires unrelenting effort; Communist agreements and treaties are worthless unless containing self-enforcing mechanisms; defense cost exemplified by bombers worth their weight in gold; heavy military expense requires elimination of waste and duplication; strong economy is foundation for national safety; competitive enterprise and freedom describe America; public understanding is needed; basic causes of inflation are wage-price spiral and deficit financing by Government; self-discipline and restraint are necessary; meet current costs (of government) from current revenue; balanced budget; ours is the noblest of causes—human freedom.

Some of Government's present conflicts and dilemmas can be detected in this message, including: Too often we make decisions based on trusting the Russians; security can jeopardize liberty when overzealous government overexpands its jurisdiction (abroad, foreign aid; at home, welfare programs); we don't balance the budget or pay-as-we-go; waste and duplication in Government is not sufficiently being sought out and stopped by Congress; politicians sponsor more Government spending with its crushing tax load, forgetful of the need for a strong free economy; competitive enterprise and freedom can be killed by Government regulations; self-discipline and restraint are frequently forgotten by self-seeking citizens and politicians; human freedom can perish from well-meaning but misguided Government "help" and taxation.

My forecasts include: Much bitter partisan politics with "criticism for criticism's sake" for political advantage; liberals proposing spending schemes without regard for a balanced budget; conservatives of both parties realizing their ideological kinship, their combined lack of strength, and the frustration of partisan politics between parties themselves split.

Questions the future will answer: Is this a labor-socialist Congress? Can the President save the day by the veto? Will the veto be sustained or overridden? Will the public understand the respective jurisdiction of the administration and Congress and help direct the course of legislation? On the answers to these, as I see it, rest the "security and liberty" of this Nation and her people.

Finally, to Dallas County people at this Congress' outset, I pledge again to support consistently all earlier stated principles made during campaigns or in Congress and live up to the congressional oath stated above, so help me God.

Amending Federal Tax Laws

OF
HON. TORBERT H. MACDONALD
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 12, 1959

Mr. MACDONALD. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced a bill designed to close one of the largest and most inequitable loopholes that exist in our tax laws. Our Federal income tax law admittedly has many devices which have caused a serious erosion of the tax base. None is worse, however, than that loophole which I now wish to call to the attention of the House. I deplore any gimmick which permits one group to escape its just share of Federal tax obligations by shifting that tax burden to others. Our tax system, largely one of self-assessment, can survive only when justice is preserved as between taxpayers of the entire country.

The loophole to which I wish to direct attention today is that which permits giant, wealthy oil and gas companies to avoid hundreds of millions of dollars of taxes which should be paid to the Federal Government. I refer to that device in the Internal Revenue Code known as oil and natural gas depletion allowance. Under the present law, income for tax purposes may be reduced by 27.5 percent of the gross income from each oil and gas property, but not to exceed 50 percent of net income. For 32 years, oil and gas companies have benefited from this device at the expense of other taxpayers of the Nation. I think the time has come when Congress should no longer pamper this giant industry. Tax favoritism and discrimination are always undesirable even when rates are low. Under present high levels, they are intolerable.

How did the oil and gas interests obtain favored tax treatment? It all started back in the days of World War I when income tax rates were greatly increased. Because of the skyrocketing cost of drilling as compared with prewar costs, Congress was persuaded to introduce a new concept into the tax law. This new concept was called "discovery value depletion," and was based upon the theory that it was unfair to limit the discoverer of an oil deposit to the recovery of his costs which were largely incurred prior to the war, when the purchaser of a proven field could recover the amount paid at war prices. Under the then existing law, oil and gas companies were allowed to recover tax free only their actual investment in depletable property. In this respect they were treated just like other industry is today. If private industry in Massachusetts, or any of the other States builds a factory to provide jobs for workers, they can recover only what is invested through depreciation allowances. Even though the property should subsequently increase in value, only what has been invested may be recovered. But this did not, and still does not, satisfy oilmen. They argued then that Congress should allow them to recover the value of the property after the discovery of oil, rather than their actual outlay. Congress went along with this in 1918. But soon great difficulty and much litigation ensued over methods of determining "discovery value." So, as a substitute, in 1926, Congress enacted the new concept of percentage depletion, which, as I have said, allows a deduction from income of 27.5 percent of the gross income from each oil or gas property limited by 50 percent of net income. The total investment may be recovered time after time, tax free. An investment of $1 million may be recovered many times over, as has been done often, with no taxes being paid on this 27.5 percent of gross income. I contend that it would make just as much sense to exempt 27.5 percent of the gross income of every actor, writer, athlete, movie star, doctor, or any other individual for that matter, who are daily depleting their creative and physical resources. Why should this special treatment be given to the largest and most wealthy corporations in our land today?

Let me emphasize this point. In classifying corporations for purposes of income statistics, the Internal Revenue Service has set up 14 categories of corporations according to the size of total assets. The highest, or 14th group includes corporations with assets of $250 million or over. In 1955, this group claimed two-thirds of all the depletion allowances taken by corporations.

I point out that, in addition to the billion dollar oil companies which benefit from percentage depletion, there are others who receive an allocable share of the deduction. I refer to lessors and royalty owners, often wealthy investors engaged in buying oil royalties from proven fields. Risks involved in oil exploration and production are sometimes cited in support of continuation of percentage depletion but certainly the buying of oil royalties from proven fields has very little risk indeed. The lessor of land on which oil is discovered usually exerts little effort or makes little contribution to a discovery; yet, he also is entitled to an allocable share of the deduction.

I may say in passing that those individuals and corporations who benefit from percentage depletion are, in effect, being subsidized by the other taxpayers of the Nation. It is a government subsidy over which Congress exercises no control. One result may well be overexploitation and waste, or exhaustion of our resources. It is my belief that normal profit incentives and the free price system are adequate to insure necessary supplies, especially where the demand for the product has nearly tripled in the last 25 years and certainly will continue to increase as more and more producing fields have been discovered.

One of the most unfortunate aspects of the legislative process develops when preferred treatment is once given to a favored group. Then others, reasoning by analogy, argue that they too should have similar preferred treatment. And Congress, instead of withdrawing it from the first, is caught in the illogic of its initial action, and extends it to a second group. Third, fourth, and succeeding groups likewise get a favorable hearing. This has been the history of percentage depletion. The oil interests have for years urged upon Congress this theory that incentives for exploration were necessary because of the risks involved and that oil was vital to our national security. In turn, the coal people argued that tax favoritism was being given to their principal competitor. Therefore, they needed relief. Now, no one will seriously contend that we are in need of additional coal fields. Estimates of available supply predict that we have enough coal for at least another 1,000 years. There is no immediate need for further exploration, nor is there current exploration. Even so, the allowance for coal is only 10 percent as compared with 27.5 percent for oil and gas. Actually, the oil industry productivity is far in excess of current demand and the exploration argument is shopworn and unconvincing.

It is my personal belief that a much fairer tax law would result if percentage depletion were entirely eliminated. Because now, not only oil and gas are legally entitled to it, but all mineral indusries receive it in varying degrees. The amounts vary from 5 percent, 10 percent, 15 percent, 23 percent, to 27.5 percent, the percentage allowed being determined to a degree by the amount of political pressure competing groups have been able to bring to bear on this body. If we could eliminate it altogether, we could add about three-quarters of a billion dollars annually to Treasury receipts.

I appreciate the fact that any proposal for the repeal of the entire idea would run into a wall of well-entrenched special interests with no possibility of passage. So, today I point out only the worst injustice and hope to appeal to those in this House who will work to correct this. I do not propose to eliminate the subsidy entirely, but seek rather to reduce the present amount from 27.5 to 15 percent.

On January 23, 1950, President Truman in his message to Congress stated:

> I know of no loophole in the tax law so inequitable as the excessive depletion exemption enjoyed by the oil and mining industries.

I want to point out that this charge was not altogether new to President Truman. President Roosevelt and his Secretaries of the Treasury long fought for the very proposal that I urge today. I must say, too, that the present administration has been less impressed with the necessity for action.

A study made by a recent Presidential Commission showed that the percentage depletion allowances taken by oil companies were 19 times as great as those which would have been allowed under cost depletion. A reduction from 27.5 to 15 percent, which I propose, would still allow these companies to write off 10 times the cost of their investment, so you can see that I can hardly be charged with being unfair to the oil and gas industry. I wish to repeat. It is not my purpose to deny oil and gas companies the opportunity to recover their investment, tax free, just as do investors in plant and machinery. But I do wish to hold that recovery to 10 times the investment instead of 19 times as can currently be done. Again, to repeat, an investor in my State who builds a factory to give jobs to workers, may recover in depreciation no more than his actual investment. Why should billion-dollar-oil companies be preferred, especially when small independent wildcatters do most of the exploring? The usual contribution of the major companies is the so-called pocketbook explorations where the major companies taking no exploratory risk, merely buy up the independent, together with his earned depletion allowance.

I would like to point out that in my opinion we cannot permit this kind of tax favoritism to continue. The result of large percentage depletion allowances of course greatly reduces the tax bill of the oil companies. However, oil companies can point to the tax law and say that they pay the same rates as all other corporations, namely 30 percent on the first $25,000 of taxable income and 52 percent on all over $25,000. That is true, but the effective rate is greatly reduced by the exclusion of large blocks of exempt income. Actually, most oil companies pay only one-third to one-half the rates that other corporations pay. For example, between 1947 and 1956, five big oil producers paid Uncle Sam only 5 percent of their total cash earnings. Five comparable industrial corporations paid 38 percent, or an additional 33 percent. A large number of producers pay not one dime in Federal income taxes, yet they report large net incomes and pay dividends to their stockholders. Obviously, there is a wrong here that needs correcting. I think that it is no coincidence that Fortune magazine found that more than a third of the Nation's wealthiest individuals had made their fortunes in oil. This, at the tax expense of all other industries.

The President stated that he will submit a balanced budget to the Congress. There have been grave doubts expressed that revenues are likely to be as large as estimated by the President or that expenditures will be as small. It is my thought that the goal of a balanced budget is one greatly to be desired at this time. It would generally be favorable for the economy of the Nation. Since inflation is a specter that is to continue to haunt us, we should certainly do what we can to stop it. The reduction of the percentage depletion allowance to 15 percent will yield a substantial sum of tax revenue estimated by the Treasury Department to be about $420 million annually. This is obviously a large sum of money. In fact, it almost exactly equals the total 1958 tax collections from all sources within the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

I wish to be as accurate as possible in my estimate of revenues to be obtained, and for that reason offer this brief explanation. The $420 million estimate given assumes a continuance of present prices and production, and no change in foreign tax credits. It appears likely that oil and gas companies may make some changes in prices if percentage depletion is eliminated. But these changes are not capable of statistical projection. If oil prices are raised, then the yield will be greater than I have estimated. If they are lowered, the yield will decline. Included in my estimate is some $95 million of additional revenue from foreign production. The Treasury fears that this increase will be largely dissipated through an increase in foreign tax credits. If this be true, then the net yield may be more in the neighborhood of $325 million. But I say to the Members of this House, that even in days of $80 billion budgets, we must not overlook the possibility of obtaining an additional third of a billion dollars, especially when the result includes greater equity in the tax laws for all our industries. This additional revenue could be used for tax relief for the small taxpayer. It could also be used to eliminate some of the excise taxes that are helping to strangle small business. The money might also be used for national health research programs; hospital construction or educational scholarship grants which are so needed.

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, enactment of my proposal will have the following desirable effects:

First. Help to close one of the largest loopholes that exist in our tax laws.

Second. Remove an inequity which is shocking both in its philosophy and its results.

Third. Add greatly needed revenue to contribute substantially toward a balanced budget.

Fourth. Reduce the probability of overexploitation and waste or exhaustion of a valuable natural resource.

Fifth. Make the availability of supplies dependent upon normal profit incentives and the free price system rather than uncontrolled subsidies.

Lincoln-Douglas Debates

OF

Hon. EVERETT McKINLEY DIRKSEN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, January 12, 1959

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, the year 1958 marked the 100th anniversary of the series of seven debates in Illinois between the Honorable Stephen Arnold Douglas, the then incumbent Senator, and Abraham Lincoln, a candidate for the Senate in that year. These debates provoked national interest, and every one of the seven communities where they were held fittingly commemorated this great event. It was my privilege to participate actively in three of these celebrations, and I submit for printing in the RECORD the address which I delivered at Freeport, Ill., on August 22, 1958, and at Galesburg, Ill., on October 7, 1958.

There being no objection, the addresses were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE MAGNIFICENT MISSIONARY

(Address by the Honorable EVERETT MCKINLEY DIRKSEN at the Lincoln-Douglas ceremonies, Freeport, Ill., August 27, 1958)

I. INTRODUCTION

Today in this inspiring communion, let me salute the magnificent missionary—Abraham Lincoln.

A missionary is one with a mission.

It is customary to think of a missionary as one who goes forth to propagate a religious faith.

Very naturally we think of Jesus Christ, of Buddha, of the Apostle Paul, of Mohammed, of Moses, of Francis Xavier, of Father Marquette, or others.

But a missionary can be more than this.

A missionary could be a dedicated group like the Crusaders. Or it could be an entire nation under a spirited leader.

The mission might be in any field of human activity.

The Roman emperors leading the legions of ancient Rome were missioners bent on conquest.

The French under Napoleon were missioners bent on world domination.

The Moors inspired by Mohammed were missioners intent on the destruction of all infidels, and that included all who did not embrace the doctrines of the Koran.

The first English in India were missioners seeking an expanding trade.

Every generation has had its individuals, it groups, its institutions, with a sense of mission in some field of human activity.

II. CIVIL MISSIONERS

Among the missionaries of mankind in the field of civil endeavor there is one who stands out above all others—that magnificent missionary—Abraham Lincoln.

He sought to propagate no religious faith.

He sought no conquest, like Caesar or Napoleon.

He neither sought nor exercised autocratic power.

He sought no material advantage.

He was a humble, common man, whose only weapons were an incandescent conviction, an unflinching zeal, an invincible logic and an unfailing sense of right and wrong.

III. THE MISSIONARY EMERGES

Not far from where we meet today, in the city of Bloomington, on May 29, 1856, the spirit of this great missioner emerged.

Two years before that date the repeal of the Missouri Compromise and also the new and hateful doctrine of popular sovereignty was breeding a strong revulsion in the land.

Heretofore the issue of slavery was essentially a policy problem.

In some quarters it was probably little more than an intellectual exercise.

When the meeting in Bloomington drew to a close, Abraham Lincoln was summoned to speak.

This was the occasion when he uttered the celebrated "Lost Speech."

The form and text may have been lost, but the spirit and the effect were imperishable.

This was the utterance which his partner, Herndon, referred to as the greatest of his life.

Until then, according to Herndon, the slavery issue had been argued on grounds of policy and not from the standpoint of eternal right.

But on this day Abraham Lincoln seemed newly baptized.

"From that day," wrote Herndon, "to the day of his death he stood firm in the right."

The smothered flame had broken forth.

A new sense of justice fired his energy.

His soul was now seasoned.

Abraham Lincoln had found his cross.

A new sense of mission was lighted.

The magnificent missionary had emerged here on the rolling prairies of Illinois destined to become one of mankind's greatest crusaders in a human cause.

IV. THE INTERIM YEARS

In that interim period between the emergence of the magnificent missionary and the time when the formal debates in this series began, not only the great moral issue of that day but also the zeal of Lincoln was being fueled.

In the presidential election of 1856 James Buchanan was elected.

In the territory called Kansas the clashes over the slavery issue were being referred to as war.

The unrestrained spirit of John Brown burst into murderous action like that of some "apocalyptical horseman of vengeance."

In that period came the amazing decision of the Supreme Court of the United States under the leadership of Chief Justice Taney in the celebrated Dred Scott case.

There came in that period a most extraordinary document called the Lecompton Constitution, under which one group expected that Kansas might enter the Union.

There was the fact of an election campaign for the United States Senate between Lincoln and Douglas and the development of sharp personalities between them as each sought a victory.

There was the fact of a growing interest beyond the boundaries of Illinois to give national significance to the contest between Lincoln and Douglas.

Thus in that period between the emergence of Abraham Lincoln's sense of mission at Bloomington 2 years before and the first of these debates at Ottawa on a hot Saturday afternoon in August of 1858, the spirit of the moral baptism was working steadily in the soul and mind of Abraham Lincoln.

V. THE MORAL LIGHT SHINES BRIGHTLY

In this great continuing discussion beginning at Ottawa and ending in Alton, few things were left undiscussed.

The debate embraced the Missouri Compromise of 1850, which sought to limit the extension of slavery.

It included the effort to repeal that compromise through the Kansas-Nebraska bill, which was piloted through a Senate committee by Judge Douglas.

It involved the Dred Scott decision in the Supreme Court of the United States.

It covered the personal life of the candidates.

But the moral issue was the overriding light.

It came in the very first discussion at Ottawa.

"I hold," said Lincoln, "there is no reason in the world why the Negro is not entitled to all the natural rights enumerated in the Declaration of Independence. The right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness * * * in the right to eat the bread without the leavy of anybody else which his own hand earns, he is my equal and the equal of Judge Douglas and the equal of every living man."

Here was the beginning of the moral thunder which was to roll down through conflict, emancipation and victory.

On they went—these gladiators—from Ottawa to Freeport, from Freeport to Jonesboro, from Jonesboro to Charleston, from Charleston to Galesburg, from Galesburg to Quincy, from Quincy to Alton.

It was then mid-October.

Here then came the final discussion.

Slavery is wrong. It is wrong. It is wrong. The very word came tumbling from Lincoln's lips over and over.

"That is the real issue," said Lincoln in the final discussion. "That is the issue that will continue in this country when these poor tongues of Judge Douglas and myself shall be silent. It is the eternal struggle between these two principles—right and wrong—throughout the world."

VI. THE CONTAGION

Then as now editors and politicians, scholars and historians could interpret the debates as they saw and felt them against the backdrop of their own day.

It may be difficult to evaluate this great event by orienting oneself into that period and then looking backward into the past and forward into the future.

Two years before the debates the missioner had emerged.

Character and conviction had emerged.

A notion of the ultimate course which the country was to take and the moral concepts which must be asserted had emerged.

The missioner had found himself.

And so on and on he went.

The issue of principle was drawn.

It was the age old struggle of right and wrong.

At first it had to be tempered to reality.

Abraham Lincoln knew that he was dealing with an entrenched institution.

He knew he was dealing with a Supreme Court, with a Congress, and with a Constitution.

He knew that he was dealing with a divided land, with a people who were sharply divided.

He was dealing with friends and party associates interested in a political victory.

He was dealing with his own senatorial candidacy.

All these were realities.

And he knew that the people must be conditioned for this whole dose of basic moral principle and the struggle between right and wrong.

This was not a case for a thimbleful of gospel.

And as the conditioning process went on, so the conditioning of the spirit of Abraham Lincoln went on.

With it all there was the slow but inevitable contagion which developed.

The thousands upon thousands of people who attended or who read the accounts were caught up in the fervor of the occasion.

They were given a sustained chance to think, to meditate on the moral issue, and to separate the superficial from the genuine.

They had a chance to get a sharpened sense of the real issue and to reflect week after week upon the basic principle of human equality.

VII. THE ULTIMATE IMPACT

The ultimate impact of this series of debates can best be found in the utterances which came later.

On a cool November afternoon at Gettysburg in the year 1863, 5 years after the debate series came to an end there came those deathless words from the lips of Lincoln, when he spoke of a nation conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal.

After 5 years the eternal truths rolled on and on.

Again, on a misty morning in the month of March 1865, in the Nation's Capital, as he stood to receive the oath for the second time, with all the agonies of carnage and death written on his rugged face and his furrowed heart, he could yet say, "It may seem strange that any man should ask a just God's assistance in wringing their bread from the sweat of other men's faces, but let us judge not that we be not judged."

Thus did a sense of mission which slowly incubated on these rolling prairies of Illinois become fashioned and shaped in these debates to carry on and on not only in the hearts of his countrymen but in the heart of a great, humble man, who to the very end dedicated himself to the spirit of what Thomas Jefferson wrote in the Declaration of Independence so many years before, when he said, where all could behold, "We hold these truths to be self-evident—that all men are created equal."

The magnificent missionary had executed the mission to which he was ordained.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN

(Address by Senator EVERETT MCKINLEY DIRKSEN at the 100th anniversary of the Lincoln-Douglas debate at Galesburg, Ill., October 7, 1958)

Ecclesiastes, so long ago remarked that "The thing which hath been, it is that which shall be and that which is done is that which shall be done; and there is no new thing under the sun." The past is prologue. And the past is tradition.

To the Thessalonians, Paul wrote, "Hold fast to the traditions ye have been taught." And what is tradition? It is the whole body of culture and beliefs, of usages and practices, of achievements and accomplishments, of personalities which come down to us from the past.

In the American tradition, shining majestically, there are the Pilgrims and pioneers, Valley Forge and Gettysburg, the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution. In it looming large are William Penn and Daniel Boone, Washington and Paine, Zenger and Marshall, Jefferson and Jackson. In it are faith and hope, tears and laughter.

And high in our tradition stands Abraham Lincoln. Can he be explained in any other way than that he was an instrument of divine destiny?

History is but the unfoldment of a divine pattern. This may be amusing in highly liberal quarters. If not this, it can only be materialistic drift. If there be a creative hand behind this universe, there must be a creative hand in its unfoldment and direction. Everything in it, sun, moon, stars, planets—their distances—the calibration so that people will neither freeze nor scorch to death—the procession of the seasons—man's subsistence—all rise to testify to the amazing adjustments in the universe to preserve life. And surely the creative force would not provide it all in such meticulous detail and then ignore its ultimate destiny.

But destiny does not unfold in a vacuum. It cannot be manifested without a vehicle, without an instrument. The light falling upon Saul enroute to Damascus to convert him into the world's great salesman was a divine hand reaching for an instrument. The voice from the heavens said to Ezekiel, "Son of man, stand upon thy feet and I will speak unto thee." Destiny was seeking an instrument. The servant of the Lord commanding Joshua to be strong and of good courage and giving him assurance and instruction was but finding an instrument for the unfoldment of history.

Abraham Lincoln standing before 15,000 people on a cold, raw, windy day in Galesburg 100 years ago today may not have seemed an instrument of an all-pervading conscience to carry on in a struggle which still besets our land a century later. How could a story teller be regarded as an instrument of destiny unless it be remembered that in a day when the vagaries of the mind were not too well understood, it is easy enough to perceive that the brooding mystic introvert can so easily conceal his introvert attributes in this understandable manner?

But consider this whole moral common man moving always godward, never too fast and never too slow, walking ever slowly but never backward.

In May of 1856 in Bloomington he delivered what came to be known as the Lost Speech. The form and text may have been lost, but not the spirit and the impact. For it was here that he received a new baptism. It was here that the moral, rather than the political or intellectual aspects of the slavery issue fired his soul and his cross was found.

Two years later, at Ottawa, it became the overriding issue for on that occasion he said, "I hold there is no reason in the world why the Negro is not entitled to all the natural rights enumerated in the Declaration of Independence, the right of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness * * * in the right to eat the bread without leave of anybody else which his own hand earns, he is my equal and the equal of Judge Douglas and the equal of every living man."

Here at Galesburg he said of his opponent that, "he is blowing out the moral lights around us when he contends that whoever wants slaves has a right to hold them." He continued, "I confess myself as belonging to that class in the country who contemplate slavery as a moral, social, and political evil having due regard for its existence among us and the difficulties of getting rid of it in a satisfactory way and to all constitutional obligations which have been thrown about it; but, nevertheless, desire a policy that looks to the prevention of it as a wrong, and looks hopefully to the time when as a wrong it may come to an end."

On they went in the discussion until at last, this far-reaching discussion carried them to the concluding debate at Alton. Over and over a word kept tumbling from Lincoln's lips. It was the word "wrong." And as they concluded, Lincoln said, "That is the real issue. That is the issue that will continue in this country when these poor tongues of Judge Douglas and myself shall be silent. It is the eternal struggle between these two principles of right and wrong through the world."

The moral contagion which Lincoln had created was spreading. At first, the moral issue had to be tempered to reality. He was dealing with an entrenched institution, with a Supreme Court, with a Congress, and with a certain concept of the Constitution. He was dealing with a divided land. He was dealing with people sharply divided. He was dealing with friends and party associates who were vitally interested in a political victory. He was dealing with his own candidacy. These were realities. Little by little, people must be conditioned for the whole dose of moral principle—wrong versus right. As the conditioning process went on, so the conditioning of his own spirit went on. The contagion was slow but inexorable.

Came that day in March 1861, when he took the oath as President of the United States. How careful he was with respect to the Constitution and the rights of the States.

How earnest were his entreaties to preserve the Union. Yet he never lost sight of the moral issue. "If the Almighty Ruler of Nations," he asked, "with his eternal truth and justice be on your side of the North or on yours of the South, that truth and that justice will surely prevail by the judgment of this great tribunal, the American people." And he continued, "Intelligence, patriotism, Christianity, and a firm reliance on Him who has never forsaken this favored land are still competent to adjust in the best way all our present difficulty." There was no word about slavery. He knew as none other knew what the ultimate solution would be.

On the first day of January in 1863 it is said that he first regaled the Cabinet by reading from one of the quaint and whimsical lectures of the current humorist, Artemus Ward. Then in a complete change of mood, he took from a drawer what turned out to be the Emancipation Proclamation. What a spectacular way to begin a new year. Having disposed of the details, he came to the final paragraph. "And upon this act, sincerely believed to be an act of justice, warranted by the Constitution, upon military necessity, I invoke the considerate judgment of mankind and the gracious favor of the Almighty God." That day there must have been unbounded joy in God's Heaven.

On a cool afternoon at Gettysburg in November of 1863, after the words of the orator of the day had faded into obscurity on the afternoon breezes, he came forth with only a few hundred words, but they were deathless. How easily and clearly he stated the issue—whether a nation conceived in liberty and dedicated to equality, can endure. There followed his appeal for a new dedication of the spirit and for a new birth of freedom. Justice and morality were marching and he was in the forefront, moving ever forward—not too fast to leave public confidence behind and not too slow to invite defeatism or to frustrate the unfoldment of a divine pattern.

Came that day in March 1864 when he stood before his countrymen again to take the oath as Chief Executive. Gettysburg was behind him now. The progress of the Union forces was more encouraging.

He might have become stern and less humble. He might have fulfilled the politicians' hopes and stated what he expected to do with the sister States still in rebellion. He might have threatened. But not so. There was no passion, no spleen, no politics. It was the instrument speaking. "If we shall suppose that American slavery is one of those offenses which in the providence of God must need come, but which having continued through his appointed time, He now wills to remove and that He gives to both North and South this terrible war as the woe due to those by whom the offense came, shall we discern therein any departure from those divine attributes which the believers in a living God always ascribe to Him?" What humility he concluded. "With malice toward none, with charity for all, with firmness in the right." There was that word again. Firmness in the right, the antithesis of wrong.

Consider finally Abraham Lincoln's last speech. It came in the evening of April 11, 1865, at the White House in response to a serenade. Lee had surrendered. There was jubilation in the land. Lincoln took the occasion to speak of the action of 12,000 voters in the State of Louisiana who had taken the necessary steps to return to the Union. Before discussing the details of the action taken by Louisiana and his obvious inclination to accept the action, even though defective in some particulars, he said to the serenaders, "In the midst of this, however, He, from whom all blessings flow, must not be forgotten. A call for a national thanksgiving is being prepared and will be duly promulgated."

Four days later, the assassin's bullet ended all that was mortal. The ages embraced him. The Lord's instrument had consummated his mission. How else shall one adjudge this exalted common man?

National Printing Week

OF

HON. ROMAN C. PUCINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 12, 1959

Mr. PUCINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention to the fact that the mayor of Chicago, the Honorable Richard J. Daley, has designated the 7-day period beginning January 11 as Printing Week in our great city.

We of Chicago are not only grateful but indeed proud that our city is the printing center of the Nation and the printing industry constitutes one of our largest industries in Chicago.

While this Nation from time to time frequently pays tribute to the various industries of America, it is my opinion that the development of printing has been one of the most effective contributing factors in the development of our democratic process and we, as Americans, should be grateful to the men and women occupied in this highly skilled trade and to the foresight of those great Americans who have helped develop this industry. We, as a nation, proudly proclaim that our democratic processes have survived because our people are the best informed people in the world. I doubt there will be any dissenters to the statement that, without the phenomenal development of the printing industry in this country, we, too, would suffer the intellectual darkness that still plagues so much of the world.

I should like to call attention to the fact that in my city, the Chicago Allied Printing Trades Council, with its executive secretary, Mr. Henry Coco, has done much to raise the standards of the printing industry, and it is through the dedicated work of organizations such as the council that this Nation has been able to make extraordinary progress in improving the printing industry.

In tribute to the thousands of Chicagoans who loyally serve the printing industry daily and because this industry is so important to all Americans, I have introduced the following resolution which I hope will receive speedy approval:

H.J. Res. 25

Joint resolution designating the seven-day period beginning January 11, 1959, as National Printing Week

Whereas the printing industry has a large measure of responsibility for the advancement and dissemination of science and culture in our Nation and throughout the world; and

Whereas the printing industry in Chicago ranks highest among all printing centers in production volume; and

Whereas the printing industry in Chicago surpasses all other industries in the number of separate manufacturing establishments, number of employees, and amount of wages paid; and

Whereas, through the printed word and the growth of America's printing industry, the population of the United States of America is composed of the best informed people of the world; and

Whereas January 17, 1959, will be the two hundred and fifty-third anniversary of the birth of Benjamin Franklin, the father of American printing, and the week of January 11 through January 17, 1959, will be marked by appropriate commemorative ceremonies throughout this continent in public, private, and commercial institutions, with particular emphasis upon the progress of printing and allied crafts: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the seven-day period beginning January 11, 1959, and ending at the close of January 17, 1959, is hereby designated as National Printing Week in honor of the printing industry and its contributions to progress. The President of the United States is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation urging the people of the United States to be mindful of the industrial, educational, cultural, and spiritual contributions which the art of printing has made and is making to the life and progress of mankind.

Tax Deduction of Expenses for Transportation To and From Work

OF

HON. THOMAS B. CURTIS

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 12, 1959

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced today a bill designed to allow a deduction for income tax purposes, in the case of a disabled individual, of expenses for transportation to and from work.

My bill would allow a disabled individual to deduct from gross income in arriving at adjusted gross income expenses up to $600 a year for transportation to and from work. For purposes of this provision, the term "disabled individual" is defined to mean an individual who has lost the use of a leg, or both legs, or of both arms, to such an extent that he is unable during the entire taxable year to use, without undue hardship or danger, public transportation as a means of traveling to and from work.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, the deduction proposed by my bill would be a real boon to those disabled citizens who need a boost to help themselves to be useful and productive citizens.

The bill follows:

A bill to allow a deduction for income tax purposes, in the case of a disabled individual, of expenses for transportation to and from work

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) part VII of subchapter B of chapter 1 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to additional itemized deductions for individuals) is amended by redesignating section 217 as

section 218 and by inserting after section 216 the following new section:

"SEC. 217. Transportation of disabled individual to and from work.

"(a) General rule: In the case of a disabled individual, there shall be allowed as a deduction, expenses paid during the taxable year for transportation to and from work to the extent that such expenses do not exceed $600.

"(b) Disabled individual defined: For purposes of subsection (a), the term 'disabled individual' means an individual who has lost the use of a leg, or both legs, or of both arms, to such an extent that he is unable during the entire taxable year to use, without undue hardship or danger, a streetcar, bus, subway, train, or similar form of public transportation, as a means of traveling to and from work."

(b) The table of sections for such part VII is amended by striking out and by inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"Sec. 217. Transportation of disabled individual to and from work.

"Sec. 218. Cross references."

(c) Section 62 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to definition of adjusted gross income) is amended by inserting after paragraph (6) the following new paragraph:

"(7) Transportation of disabled individuals: The deduction allowed by section 217."

SEC. 2. The amendments made by the first section of this act shall apply only with respect to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1955.

Introduction of Bill To Remove Dual Employment Limitation in Employment of Retired Officers of the Uniformed Services in Civilian Positions in the Federal Service

OF
HON. JOHN F. BALDWIN, JR.
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, January 12, 1959

Mr. BALDWIN. Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday, January 7, 1959, I introduced a bill, H.R. 701, the result of which will, if enacted, make available to our Government highly trained and loyal citizens to serve our country in civilian positions under our Federal system. I refer to the opportunity we shall then have of employing some retired officers of the uniformed services in civilian positions in our Federal services who are presently barred from such employment.

Under present laws, most career retired officers of our uniformed services are entirely barred from employment by the Federal Government in civilian positions, while many others, when employable, are so severely restricted in accepting such positions as to render it impossible for them to accept such employment. Reference is made to the so-called Dual Employment Act of 1894 (act of July 31, 1894; 5 U.S.C. 62) and the restrictions contained in the Economy Act of 1932 (sec. 212 of the act of June 30, 1932; 5 U.S.C. 59(a)).

Under the Dual Employment Act of 1894, commissioned officers of the regular services are not employable by the Federal Government in civilian positions if their retired pay exceeds $2,500 per annum, unless retired for physical disability or elected to office or appointed thereto by the President with Senate confirmation. Thus, almost all retired officers of the regular military services are barred from employment by our Government, if they have not been retired for physical disability. Under this law, they may not even waive their retired pay to thus serve their country since the statute simply bars them from any civilian employment by our Government. Recently, General Quesada found it necessary to resign his earned retired status in order to serve the President of the United States in an appointment which did not require Senate confirmation.

When retired officers are employable in civilian positions under the Federal Government, unless they have been retired for physical disability as the result of combat wounds or the explosion of an instrumentality of war, they may not, under the provisions of section 212 of the Economy Act of 1932, receive a total compensation of more than $10,000 per annum. If they are employable and the compensation of the civilian position exceeds $10,000 per annum, they may waive their retired pay during their incumbency in the civilian position. Those retired for combat wounds or the explosion of an instrumentality of war may keep both their retired pay and the pay of the Federal civilian position. Prior to 1932 all retired officers who were employable by the Federal Government received both their earned retired pay and the pay of the civilian office.

It should also be noted that these restrictive provisions do not apply to retired members of the Reserve components of our armed services. For many years, under appropriate legislation, it was established that members of the Reserve components of our Armed Forces would not be in any way restricted in their civilian pursuits, including employment by our Government. That provision has been reenacted and made to apply, generally, to all members of the Reserve components in the Armed Forces Reserve Act of 1952, which became effective on January 1, 1953. Nowadays, we have career retirement for reservists as well as for regulars. In addition, reserve officers now serve on long periods of active duty. It is entirely appropriate that they should be entirely free from restrictions in their employment opportunities like other citizens. We should have comparable legislation excluding retired officers of the Regular services from such restrictions, thus making all retired officers of the uniformed services available to the Government for civilian employment where the best interests of the country require such employment. Furthermore, such officers should be entitled to receive both their retired pay, which they have earned in active service in the Armed Forces of their country, and whatever civilian compensation may attach to any position under the Federal Government in which they may be employed.

The present situation has a twofold detrimental effect. It renders impossible employment of competent and available retired officers, highly trained and experienced in important fields of Government activity, at a time when their service would be greatly beneficial in the defense effort. It also deprives these officers of the opportunity of employment by their Government in civilian positions to which other citizens of the United States are eligible. It relegates these loyal military servants of the Government to a position of second-class citizenship.

Retirement laws, applicable to the armed services, properly provide that some officers be retired from the top of each rank each year and for enforced retirement upon the attainment of certain maximum allowable ages in each rank. This has been found essential to maintain the officer personnel of the services at the highest possible state of proficiency, both professionally and in physical health. It does, however, result in the loss of service to the Government of substantial numbers of highly trained, loyal and efficient officers whose services could and should be used in other governmental agencies. Yet far from planning for such use, especially in these times when we should be utilizing our available manpower to the best advantage in the defense effort in which we are now engaged for our very survival, there exist these outmoded and restrictive dual employment and dual compensation laws, which should be amended to make this potential source of manpower available to our national use. In this respect, it should be asked, Do our international competitors similarly bar themselves from the use of their trained military officers? The question suggests its own answer.

There is a mounting opinion, among those who are aware of this situation, that our present policy is wasteful in manpower and wrong. I am sure that Members of the House will wish to see the existing restrictions against the employment of retired career commissioned officers removed. That is what my bill, if enacted, will accomplish.

Washington Report

OF
HON. BRUCE ALGER
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, January 12, 1959

Mr. ALGER. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include my newsletter for January 17, 1959:

WASHINGTON REPORT
(By Congressman BRUCE ALGER, Fifth District, Texas)

Organization of the House membership topped the week's proceedings. All Members are assigned to permanent committees which by subject consider pending legislation. The majority party (Democrat, 283 Members) and minority party (Republican, 153 Members) membership ratios are decided by the House leaders so that the majority party clearly controls each committee numerically. The committees (alphabetically) are: Agriculture, Appropriations, Armed Services, Banking and Currency, District of Columbia, Education and Labor, Foreign Affairs, Government Operations, House Administration, Interior and Insular Affairs, Interstate and Foreign Commerce, Judiciary, Merchant Marine and Fisheries, Post Office and Civil Service, Public Works, Rules, Space, Un-American Activities, Veterans' Affairs, and Ways and Means.

The Ways and Means Committee (15 Democrat, 10 Republican limit) has jurisdiction over the fields of taxation, trade and tariffs, and social security, and is considered a choice committee. On the Democrat side this committee also names the Democrats to the other committees. I am honored indeed to be nominated to this important committee, although I shall miss the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee with its interesting transportation problems, and where I had progressed to the eighth seat.

The Chance Vought Regulus II contract termination prompted by pre-Christmas inquiry of the Secretary of Defense whether a void was created in our defense posture. The answer from Vice Admiral Pirie gave two general explanations: (1) "Regulus II missions will be reassigned to carrier heavy attack aircraft" (isn't this a backward step?); and (2) "the accelerated Polaris is scheduled to become operational in quantities at approximately the same time Regulus II was originally scheduled." Suspicion that there may indeed be a gap or void of many months up to several years not having been answered, I have asked other questions of Admiral Pirie and the Secretary of Defense. Surprisingly enough, no mention was made of economizing in the defense budget as a reason for contract termination.

As I see the Congressman's it is twofold (now that contract termination has focused attention to defense efforts within the Fifth District of Texas). First, as a Federal representative, it is important that I take my part (representing my constituents) in helping to provide the best defense for the money spent. Second, it is my duty, as I see it, to help inform my constituents so they may better understand the defense problems, and this requires Defense Department explanation, particularly in view of worker layoffs and the spending of taxpayers' money on weapons. A temperate but conscientious effort to understand is necessary, not complacency or blind acceptance of the military's decisions, no matter how able the military men making the decisions. As an economy-minded Member of Congress with voting record to match (assuming that economizing played a part in Regulus II termination) I do not intend that we sacrifice our defense needs unnecessarily while we blandly spend more on social programs. I shall not fail to accept my responsibility to the Defense Department and to my constituents. In that spirit I intend to press this inquiry.

An additional judgeship for the northern judicial district is sorely needed and I presented a bill to accomplish this, as an emergency and exceptional case. The three judges of the northern district, Judge Whitfield Davidson, Judge Joe Estes, and Judge Joe Dooley, averaged 612 new civil cases docketed in fiscal 1958 as compared to the nationwide average of 273. Further, Judge Dooley's recent accident, a broken hip, will remove him 5 or 6 months. Truly, a desperate situation. It is my hope that Congress will consider this nonpolitically, as an exceptional case, rather than get into a wrangle and delaying action over who will appoint the 45 judges needed across the land—a Republican or Democrat President.

Operation abolition of the Un-American Activities Committee spearheaded by JAMES ROOSEVELT and other avowed liberals may have been stalled by the valiant and factual work of Chairman WALTERS and Committee Members SCHERER, JACKSON, and DOYLE. It seems that a gigantic effort has been planned to discredit this committee of Congress and J. Edgar Hoover. You would think the Communist conspiracy a patriotic American movement rather than a dedicated effort to overthrow our Government and enslave our people. This also brings to mind the gala reception for Mikoyan, a leader in this worldwide conspiracy whose chief target is the United States. Why should anything beyond the barest diplomatic protocol arrangements be accorded him?

A balanced budget, the spending of no more by the Federal Government than we take in, shall be my continued interest as it has for the last 4 years. For the sake of everyone, the dollar must not be cheapened. The President promises to point the way in his budget message. Let's all get behind this effort.

JANUARY 17, 1959.

OF
HON. FRANK E. SMITH OF MISSISSIPPI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, January 12, 1959

Mr. SMITH of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, Dr. Felix J. Underwood, who contributed more to Mississippi than any other Mississippian during my lifetime, passed away on Friday, January 9. Although Dr. Underwood had officially retired last June as head of the Mississippi State Board of Health, he was still hard at work in his office when death came so suddenly.

Dr. Underwood left private practice to enter the public health service in 1917.

I can never care for more than 2,000 or 3,000 people as a private physician—

He said.

As a public health physician I can care for millions.

Dr. Underwood's own career proved this to be literally true. It was a popular saying in Mississippi that he had saved a million lives. During his administration deaths from malaria were cut from nearly 1,000 annually to less than 1 per decade. Maternal deaths were reduced from 7 for each 1,000 live births to slightly more than 1. Tuberculosis deaths dropped from 4,000 a year to rare cases. Venereal disease is down 93 percent.

Dr. Underwood received the Laska Foundation Public Health Service Award and many other tributes for his great work in the health field. I was especially pleased by the fact that in the year of his retirement the editors of my State voted him the man of the year in Mississippi for 1958.

Under unanimous consent, I would like to include as part of the RECORD, first an excerpt from my book "The Yazoo River," which describes some of Dr. Underwood's work in the Mississippi Delta, and an editorial from the Clarksdale Press Register and from the Memphis Commercial Appeal:

EXCERPTS FROM "THE YAZOO RIVER"

(By Hon. FRANK E. SMITH of Mississippi)

A few farsighted individuals began to protect themselves and their homes from mosquitoes after the Gorgas discoveries became known, but relatively little was accomplished that was not already foreordained in the interest of personal comfort—protection from the bite of the mosquito, not its consequences. The first real attack on malaria made in the delta came only after 1920, when a young man from the hills came down to Jackson to become director of the Mississippi Department of Public Health. Felix J. Underwood and the miracles he has accomplished on a threadbare budget are something of a legend in American public health services, but there is no better record than his attack on malaria in the delta. His first job was to persuade the counties to set up proper public health departments as a means of spreading health education and preventive practices. The people had to be taught that the mosquito bite brought malaria and that the mosquito could be controlled by eliminating his breeding areas. The 1920's were a period when Federal Government agencies were a long way from the idea of major health expenditures in Mississippi; Dr. Underwood had to get his pump-priming money from the Rockefeller Foundation.

Dr. Underwood was convinced that most malarial transmissions were made by night-biting mosquitoes. Homes could be screened to keep the mosquito away from sleeping victims. More than just telling about this, the State board of health established screen-door factories at strategic points in the delta. Strong screen doors were made to fit tenant houses and furnished at cost to plantation owners who would agree to screen the cabin windows, which could be done by merely tacking screen wire across the window casings.

During much of the early period of the delta's history, many of the largest life insurance companies in the country came into the area only for investment purposes. Farm mortgages produced a good income, and eventually financing of farm operations became part of the overall insurance investment program. Some of these same life insurance companies would not write policies on delta citizens because of the high malaria mortality and other adverse health conditions. In the late 1920's the State board of health submitted the first survey of the accomplishments of the malaria control program, and the insurance companies decided they could take the risk on deltans. Today all special area rate discriminations have been eliminated.

The depression knocked out Dr. Underwood's screen funds, as well as his cooperating planters, but the depression-born WPA offered him a chance for an even more extensive program. For 7 years, beginning in 1935, a malaria control program emphasizing elimination of mosquito breeding places was in operation, with approximately 1,000 WPA workers assigned to the project in the Yazoo-delta area.

WPA ended with World War II, but the war-borne development of DDT as an anti-malarial insecticide brought dividends to the delta. A Federal malaria control program was carried on 5 years after the war. Dr. Underwood allotted all of Mississippi's share of this program for the mass use of DDT as a residual spray in the interior of substandard homes in the delta. The Federal program has been ended, but many delta counties and cities today still carry on a limited spraying program in some fashion, with generally popular results.

The residual spray program, like most of the other malarial control measures, had very important secondary benefits. The spray killed flies and other pests just as it killed mosquitoes. In one county the infant death rate dropped 64 percent, largely as a result of the practical elimination of dysentery and other intestinal disorders.

Cold figures best tell the story of the antimalarial campaign which the Mississippi State Board of Health has led. In 1920 there were 65,271 reported cases of malaria in 17 delta counties, with death resulting in 477 cases. In 1951, in the same counties, with much better reporting facilities, there were only nine cases of malaria, with no deaths.

The delta feels sure that it has licked malaria, but Dr. Underwood is still on the alert. Malaria is still endemic in the area, and there is always the chance of more aggressive forms of it being brought in by returning troops. The development of rice planting is going to offer opportunities for increased mosquito breeding. Dr. Underwood and his board of health will be watching.

[From the Clarksdale (Miss.) Press Register, Jan. 10, 1959]

DR. FELIX J. UNDERWOOD

The death late yesterday of Dr. Felix J. Underwood, 75-year-old "retired" executive officer of the Mississippi State Board of Health, took from the scene a dedicated public servant.

Dr. Underwood's entire life stands as an enduring monument—a credit to the man, to his profession, and to the people of the State he dearly loved and served with an unselfish devotion.

We use the term "retired" in quotes to describe him, because for a man like Dr. Underwood there could be no such thing as retirement as long as there were battles to be fought in man's never-ending struggle with disease and death. The only kind of retirement possible for him came yesterday when he died suddenly while hard at work in an office which he no longer officially held.

For 10 years after graduating in medicine in 1908 Dr. Underwood practiced at Aberdeen, Miss., growing dissatisfied with private practice because he could "never care for more than a few thousand people." So he joined the State health board in 1917, becoming executive head 7 years later at a time when mass killers and cripplers like typhoid, malaria, dysentery, pellagra, infantile paralysis, and other mass infectious diseases still stalked Mississippi like the Horsemen of the Apocalypse.

Under his leadership in public health maternal deaths were reduced from 7 to 1 in every thousand births. Where malaria once claimed a thousand lives a year, there is now scarcely more than one case every decade. Swamps were drained and people educated to screening and sanitation under his guidance. Working with the late, great Dr. Henry Boswell he played his part in developing the sanitarium, and tuberculosis no longer claims 4,000 Mississippians every year. Venereal disease has been reduced 95 percent in the past 30 years, and pellagra, typhoid, and infectious dysentery are almost unknown to this generation.

Much recognition but little material reward came to Dr. Underwood. He passed up many opportunities to improve his own position in order to fight the good fight for the general health of the people of this State.

Just last month Dr. Underwood was properly honored as man of the year in Mississippi for 1958, and next week he was to receive one of the first annual awards for distinguished service to the State, presented by the First Federal of Jackson Foundation and administered by the University of Mississippi.

Any recognition extended to Dr. Felix J. Underwood, the man who saved a million lives, was more than deserved.

[From the Memphis Commercial Appeal]

DR. FELIX J. UNDERWOOD

On the roster of those who have rendered invaluable service to the people of Mississippi in particular and the Nation in general the name of Dr. Felix J. Underwood will stand very high. When he retired, last June, as executive officer of the State board of health he had held that post for 34 years and had won the right to be called the man who saved a million lives.

Dr. Underwood had battled unceasingly against ailments such as typhoid, malaria, and diphtheria until their ravages among the people of Mississippi had been reduced to a minimum. He was of great aid to the late Dr. Henry Boswell in developing Mississippi's highly effective campaign against tuberculosis. In fact, anything that affected the public health was his concern so that he became outstanding in that field.

In addition to his immediate duties, Dr. Underwood worked with professional organizations and had been president of State, regional, and national associations. He was physician to a nation, that is to say.

It is good to know that United Press International newspaper, radio, and television editors had named Dr. Underwood Mississippi's man of the year for 1958 last month. He had also been selected to receive the University of Mississippi's "Missy" Award for Distinguished Service.

Dr. Underwood so employed his talents and energies that he left the world a far better place than it would have been without him, and the fact is an epitaph among the finest.

Speech of Hon. Hale Boggs, of Louisiana, at Constitution Day Ceremony

OF

HON. HALE BOGGS

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 12, 1959

Mr. BOGGS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following Constitution Day speech I made before the Sons of the American Revolution, New Orleans, La., September 17, 1958:

Mr. Chairman, distinguished guests, ladies and gentlemen, it is a great pleasure and privilege to be invited to participate in this Constitution Day ceremony here in the council chambers of our city hall. I congratulate all of the wonderful civic, patriotic, and fraternal organizations who have made this occasion possible. I am pleased, if you will pardon a personal reference, to be numbered among the members of quite a few of the sponsoring organizations here today.

I am glad that you are meeting here at the seat of local government. The very essence of our Constitution is in its recognition of the various areas of sovereignty, and the government which is encouraged most under that system is local government because it is closest to the people and thus has a fuller appreciation of their problems, needs, and difficulties. We have seen too many efforts made by too many people, especially during the last 50 years, to chip away local authority and to move it to the Capitol in Washington.

Some time ago, one of the great American television networks made its facilities available to the blustering present-day leader in the Kremlin, Mr. Khrushchev. Utilizing this opportunity, he had much to say. Among other things, he told the American people that our grandchildren would live in a Socialist society. Socialism to him, of course, meaning Russian communism. He based this prediction on his assertion that this Russian communism represented progress and that our system represented reaction and the lack of progress. This prediction of the loss of liberty for all Americans will not come to pass, unless we forget the lessons of history and unless we fail to understand the overall struggle in which we are now involved.

To say that Mr. Khrushchev's premise is false is, of course to repeat the obvious. In my judgment, there can be no doubt about the fact that the men who drafted our Declaration of Independence, our Constitution, and our Bill of Rights were divinely inspired because they confected a system of government with precise checks and balances; of division of authority between State and Federal sovereignties, and between the executive, the legislative, and the judicial branch in the Federal structure which was not only to become the model for all democratic peoples throughout the world, but was also the most revolutionary system of government ever invented.

The Communist system, on the other hand, Mr. Khrushchev's system, is pure reaction. The Russian revolution simply substituted one form of serfdom for another. Some of you, no doubt, have read the book entitled "The New Class," written by Milovan Djilas, the Yugoslav Communist who is now in prison. There he points out the rise of a vicious new class system under communism. The American Revolution, on the other hand, actually gave people the opportunity to strive and to work in an atmosphere of maximum security and freedom and without the stultifying impediments of the class-ridden societies of Europe, or the heavyhanded interference of a ruthless central government.

This essential freedom, made possible by the American Revolution and the American Constitution, accounts for the greatness of America. But to fail to recognize the dangers we face would be inviting destruction.

And, frankly, my friends, the thing that worries me about Mr. Khrushchev's challenge is that we, like many people who have preceded us, may be becoming too self-centered, too self-satisfied, too complacent. As wrong as the Communist idea has been, they have nevertheless succeeded in obtaining dedicated people to work for that wrong idea. Believe me, we need more dedicated people.

The idea that nations are permanent, that they cannot be vanquished, is one which has never been proved in history. What happened to Rome and Greece is well recorded in ancient history, and, in more recent time, we have seen the end of empires dominated at one time or another by the Dutch, the Spanish, the British, the French, the Germans, and the Japanese.

As a matter of fact, today as if by some omnipotent magic, the stage of the world has been stripped of all but two titanic actors: the Soviet Union and ourselves. It is against this background that we must ponder the future and take stock of our weaknesses as well as our strength. And, believe me, we do have many weaknesses. Some of them all of us are aware of.

In a sense, I believe that most of us are influenced by what might be called the installment plan mentality. This mentality dictates that you yourself never have to do anything for yourself, provided you make a small downpayment and pay the rest on easy terms, stretching into a vague but always rosy future.

Or, put another way, we are the victims of what is called the easy way. We see this every day all about us. Turn on your television set. Like as not, you will see an ad of a housewife in a kitchen holding a greasy skillet that within a second or two, and without any exertion on her part—merely through the application of some miracle cleaner—the skillet is brand new and shines like the sun. This easy-do-it philosophy is applied to everything.

Other advertisements tell young men and women that they can acquire the equivalent of a college education if they but buy a set of books (on the installment plan) and look at them a few minutes every day; that you really don't have to work hard to get an education.

In other words, there is always some shortcut.

Unfortunately, we have translated this so-called easy way into our national thinking and into our foreign policy. We want an easy Defense Establishment, one that does not require too many dollars, or too many hours of training, or too much research, or too much study and experimentation, or too much time, or too many young men.

We seem also to suffer from an obsession of being in a hurry. In the conduct of foreign policy, we seem to think that we can get each job done like constructing a building and then turn to some other project. The idea of patient, time-consuming negotiations seems to elude us completely. On the other hand, our antagonists unfortunately seem to understand time. To give you but one example:

During the First World War when the Germans had defeated czarist Russia, and Lenin had begun the Russian revolution, the Germans through the Treaties of Bucharest and Brest-Litovsk, practically dismembered Russia, so great were their seizures of former Russian, Polish, and Finnish territory. Because of this many Russians wanted to resume war with the Germans. But Lenin forbade it. "Let the Germans have it," he said quietly, "one day we'll get it all back."

If time is of the essence to us, it is not necessarily of the essence to our antagonists. If we like to set target dates and keep them at whatever cost in diplomacy, our antagonists are unconcerned with them. And, I might add, neither is destiny concerned with target dates.

We are in a marathon contest with people to whom the marathon distance is congenial. We must, therefore, learn to contain ourselves lest we become exhausted before the race is half run. We must revise our attitudes toward time. We must think less of target dates and more of the long-range goal. We must find ways to be patient. All of this is difficult. But it is not written in the stars that our lives should be easy or that we should always live with our way uncontested by others.

Let's note another of our traits. When we are facing a concrete objective, such as fighting a war, we bring to the struggle whatever may be necessary for victory. But once the objective is achieved, once the war is over, and other qualities must come into play in order to win and to keep the peace, we falter.

Once the war is over the qualities necessary to winning and keeping the peace are patience, tact, conciliation, compromise, and above everything else—tenacity. Here we fall short. After the First World War these qualities did not assert themselves among us and so there was set in motion the train of events that led to the Second World War.

But scarcely had the guns of the Second World War stopped firing when, despite all our talk about sticking it out, we did not even hastily demobilize. We hysterically disbanded the mightiest fighting force men had ever known. We abandoned or shoved into the sea billions of dollars' worth of military equipment. And in doing all this we not only left vacuums that others rushed in to fill, we also presented to the world the disquieting and revealing spectacle of a people who knew how to do a job but did not know how to complete a task.

If these are our attitudes, are they likely to fill others whom we must have as friends and allies, with confidence in our leadership?

The easy way, unfortunately, has even been translated into our educational system. We have found ourselves falling back in training scientists and technicians, engineers, and physicists. We realize now that there is no easy way to get these people, that there is no substitute for hard work, hard study, and long hours.

Unfortunately, somehow or other, we have even failed to translate the picture of America to the rest of the world. No nation has ever been more generous and asked for less in return. During this century we have fought two tremendous wars and not only have we not acquired 1 inch of territory as a result thereof, but we have spent billions of dollars to rehabilitate our former enemies. We have encouraged the new nations in their struggles for self-expression and self-determination all over the world.

As a matter of fact, not a new flag flies under the sun today that in some way does not owe at least part of its liberty to the great American Revolution with its Declaration of Independence, its Bill of Rights, and its Constitution. And yet, we are unfortunately being portrayed to the world as a Nation of complacent people interested only in the accumulation of wealth and greater comforts.

In the Middle East, for example, the whole concept of freedom and liberty is the result of our people—our engineers, our businessmen, our missionaries, our American university in Beirut. The great progress made there against poverty and disease is largely the result of our work. And yet, today in that area of the world, we are pictured as greedy and grasping, interested only in exploiting the oil riches and totally unconcerned with the needs of the people.

The record of American largess and of concern for other peoples is a long and a magnificent and a glorious one. There are countries in the world where millions of people have been saved from pestilence by the work of our Government and by the work of private American institutions.

In Thailand, for instance, the dread malaria has almost been eliminated, and in Colombia the frightful and painful disease of yaws has been wiped out in a few years. The same applies in countless areas. And yet, we have demonstrations against our Vice President and other public officials in some of these countries. This means, as I see it, my friends, that we are failing dismally to portray America as it really is to other peoples of the world—to give the real picture of life on our farms, in our towns, and in our cities, and how we as Americans do more to help one another in everyday life than probably any people on the face of the earth.

But you see, the battle for the minds of men is every bit as important as the military struggle and in this arena as in others, there is no easy answer, no quick solution.

I was amazed and astonished by the recent polls conducted by Dr. Gallup which indicated that in the opinion of most Americans it is thought that the average return on the average corporate investment runs 20 to 30 percent. Even more astonishing were surveys conducted outside of the United States which showed people in Montevideo saying that the average investment yielded 60 percent and people in Western Europe using figures as high as 47 percent. This demonstrates that American business, in general, has a real job of public relations to do!

Certainly, this is the result of the Communist Party line that free enterprise means tremendous profits for a few people without passing on a fair share of earnings to the workers. This nonsense must be counteracted with the truth, not only in the United States but throughout the world.

What are the cures? Well, as the saying goes, the following are for sure:

We must adopt a longrun view of world affairs. The race is not always to the swift.

We must accept struggle and peril as part of our daily portion.

We must possess ourselves in patience.

All this may require a substantial transformation in our temperament. We are impatient. But our potential enemy is endlessly patient. Many of his ambitions of today were his ambitions 400 years ago.

The price of freedom has always been high. It was high at Valley Forge and Lexington. It was high at the Marne in 1914. It was high in France in 1944. But the price of defeat is death and slavery.

If the price of freedom is eating hoecake and molasses, I am for that.

If its price is hoecake and branch water, I am for that.

We must elect to be wise or foolish; to vacillate or persevere, to survive or perish.

Finally, we must have a genuine appreciation and understanding of American liberty and freedom; we must as individuals dispel by word and example, wherever we go, the clever Communist propaganda directed deliberately against us; and we must realize that our society will not survive unless we will it so; that our Constitution as great as it is will only survive as long as the people are dedicated to its principles.

Tax Credit for Education

OF
HON. THOMAS B. CURTIS
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, January 12, 1959

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced a bill today to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to allow a 30-percent credit against the individual income tax for amounts paid as tuition or fees to certain public and private institutions of higher education.

The increased financial burden is a major barrier to the student's education. This bill is designed to encourage many parents to reappraise their financial ability to pay the costs of a child's education, so that more children can avail themselves of our country's rich educational opportunities.

The basic features of my bill which I believe to be sound in terms of fairness to the taxpayer and of service to the national interest are the following:

First. The bill would apply only to higher education—that above the 12th grade—including colleges, graduate schools, professional schools, junior colleges, technical institutes, teachers' summer courses, and the like.

Second. The payments involved would be only those made to educational institutions which meet the tests for special tax treatment under the present income-tax laws.

Third. In order to eliminate any possible feeling that the bill would discriminate in favor of taxpayers in higher brackets, it would provide that 30 percent of the student fees would be taken as a tax credit on the tax bill. Thereby the cost to the Government would be approximately the same as if the student fees were made deductible, but the relief to all taxpayers would be the same regardless of their tax bracket.

Fourth. A ceiling of $450 for each student would be placed on the amount of the tax credit. This would mean that that portion of any tuition above $1,500 per year would not result in any further tax credit. It would be hoped that this ceiling would be sufficient to cover the tuition charges for graduate and professional education as well as for that at the college level.

Fifth. There would appear to be no occasion for limiting the taxpayer entitled to receive the tax credit to any particular relationships with the student. The neighbor or employer of a promising but financially poor boy or girl frequently proposes to pay his or her tuition to make higher education possible, provided the tax payment can be made deductible, but this is difficult under present laws. It would be expected that the tax credit plan would bring out more funds in the nature of scholarships to those unrelated to the taxpayer but in whom the taxpayer has some philanthropic interest.

Sixth. No tax credit would be allowed on amounts for tuition and fees supplied in the form of scholarships, fellowships, or grants from sources other than the taxpayer himself. It would be assumed that payment of tuition and fees would be the first charge against such a scholarship, fellowship, or grant.

It is my opinion that such a tax credit will be a stimulus to more efficient use of private and public institutions. The result would be encouragement of broad distribution of student enrollment in all types of institutions, an objective which has always been considered to be in the public interest, and which is of even greater importance in the current emergency situation.

A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to allow a 30 percent credit against the individual income tax for amounts paid as tuition or fees to certain public and private institutions of higher education

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) part IV of subchapter A of chapter 1 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to credits against tax) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"SEC. 39. Tuition and fees paid by individuals to institutions of higher education.

"(a) General rule: There shall be allowed to an individual, as credit against the tax imposed by this subtitle for the taxable year, an amount equal to 30 percent of the aggregate amount paid during the taxable year by such individual to institutions of higher education as tuition or fees for the education of such individual or of any other individual at a level above the twelfth grade.

"(b) Limitations.

"(1) Individual receiving education must be full-time student: Amounts paid for the education of any individual which (but for this paragraph) would be taken into account under subsection (a) shall be taken into account only if such individual is a student (as defined in section 151(e)(4) for the calendar year in which the taxable year of the taxpayer begins.

"(2) Adjustment for scholarships and certain allowances: In the case of any individual who for any period receives—

"(A) any scholarship or fellowship grant (within the meaning of section 117(a)(1)) which, under section 117, is not includible in gross income, or

"(B) any education and training allowance under part IV of title II of the Veterans' Readjustment Assistance Act of 1952, any amount paid for tuition or fees for such period which (but for this paragraph) would be taken into account under subsection (a) shall be taken into account only to the extent that the aggregate of such tuition and fees charged such individual for such period exceeds the sum of (i) an amount equal to all the scholarships and fellowship grants described in subparagraph (A) received by such individual for such period, plus (ii) an amount equal to 30 percent of all the allowances described in subparagraph (B) received by such individual for such period.

"(3) Maximum taken into account: Amounts paid during any calendar year with respect to the education of an individual which (but for this paragraph) would be taken into account under subsection (a) shall be taken into account only to the extent that they do not exceed $1,500. The Secretary or his delegate shall prescribe such regulations as may be necessary for the application of this paragraph in cases where two or more taxpayers pay amounts with respect to the education of the same individual.

"(4) Credit not to cause refund of tax: The credit allowed by this section shall not exceed the amount of the tax imposed by this chapter for the taxable year, reduced by the sum of the credits allowable under sections 33 (relating to foreign tax credit), 34 (relating to credit for dividends received by individuals), 35 (relating to partially tax-exempt interest), and 37 (relating to retirement income).

"(c) Institution of higher education defined: For purposes of this section, the term 'institution of higher education' means only an educational institution—

"(1) which normally maintains a regular faculty and curriculum and normally has a regularly organized body of students in attendance at the place where its educational activities are carried on;

"(2) which regularly offers education at a level above the twelfth grade; and

"(3) contributions to or for the use of which are deductible under section 170."

(b) The table of sections for such part IV is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"SEC. 39. Tuition and fees paid by individuals to institutions of higher education."

SEC. 2. The amendments made by this Act shall apply only with respect to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1957.

Do We Need an Overseas Trade Monopoly in Order To Compete With the Soviet State Trading Apparatus in Critical Sectors of the World Market?

OF
HON. FRANK THOMPSON, JR.
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, January 12, 1959

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, the visit of Anastas I. Mikoyan to our country to promote trade between the United States and the U.S.S.R. will have served a useful purpose if it causes us to greatly strengthen our own trading policies.

During the week of December 1, 1958, the Subcommittee on Foreign Trade Policy of the House Committee on Ways and Means took a look at the Russian trade monopoly when experts from seven Federal departments and agencies testified regarding it. It became clear, after hearing these witnesses, that while our Government recognizes the inherent danger to our way of life from the Russian trade offensive, it has no policy to meet or equal it. The United States is not alone in lacking such a policy. The Finnish Government collapsed recently, a victim of Russian economic pressure. Brave little Finland, which fought the Russian military juggernaut almost to a standstill only 20 years ago, collapsed like a house of cards when Russia refused to trade with the Finns. About the same time the Government of Iceland resigned because of economic difficulties and the Communists were conspicuously active in bringing this about too.

John J. Powers, Jr., president of the international division of Charles Pfizer & Co., Inc., told 500 members of the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association at a meeting in New York's Waldorf-Astoria Hotel that—

The enemy has devised new techniques and is launching a major offensive on a worldwide basis, while we are still in the perilous position of preparing only for a shooting war that may never come. Recent Russian international trade disruptions in aluminum, tin, and other commodities are as much a sign of war as the shooting in Quemoy and the political maneuvering in Berlin. The Soviet bloc clearly demonstrated that it will dump, that it will sell under cost for political purposes, that it will use inflation as a political weapon, and that it will extend long-term, low-interest loans.

Mr. Powers and other able observers conclude that Russia is winning over the economically underdeveloped, politically neutral countries by linking their aspirations to Russian goods and technology.

We can only hope that as other countries come face to face with econon realities similar to those which led to the overthrow of the Governments of Finland and Iceland that they will take a second look at the well-filled Christmas stockings offered by the Russian Santa Claus. Uncle Sam has given away over $60 billion since the end of World War II. This has not succeeded in endearing him to other nations who prefer trade to aid. With a fraction of what we have spent Russia is being phenomenally successful by a trade offensive in which aid, as we know it, has at best but an insignificant role. Somehow aid has been easier for us and we have chosen the easy way. Our best interest in the long run demands more trade and less aid. This is a task for all of us to get going on, business, President Eisenhower, and the Congress. The National Planning Association, with the aid of a Rockefeller grant, and the Business Advisory Council of the Federal Government's Department of Commerce are each making painstaking studies of how we in the United States and the free world can meet and master the Russian trade offensive. It is not a minute too soon.

According to a press report by James Reston—New York Times, December 2, 1958—the administration has been discussing quietly for the past 6 months the advisability of establishing an overseas trade monopoly to compete with the Soviet state trading apparatus in critical sectors of the world market.

The current groping for some line of action by which to counter the Soviet thrusts in selected markets must be viewed against the broad setting of recent commercial policy of the U.S.S.R. and the aggressive tactics employed by its trade monopoly as both buyer and seller.

I. RECENT TACTICS OF THE SOVIET TRADE MONOPOLY

Within the past 2 or 3 years the Soviet trading apparatus has attracted worldwide attention by a series of acts tending to draw several smaller countries into its own commercial orbit and to undermine the competitive position of a number of other trading nations. Some of the tactics used by the U.S.S.R., through the medium of its trade monopoly, may be summarized as follows:

A. Buying up of pressing surpluses

First. During 1956–57 it moved to relieve Burma of its rice surpluses by buying at the rate of 114,000 metric tons a year.

Second. In Iceland, it has made heavy purchases of fish in the past 2 years, at the rate of 45,000 tons per annum.

Third. Large-scale procurement of cotton and rice was ordered in Egypt: 60,000 tons yearly of the former and 70,000 tons of the latter.

Fourth. In Uruguay and Argentina, the U.S.S.R. recently appeared as a new, and reportedly welcome, buyer of wool, taking four to five thousand tons a year from each country.

NOTE: While the above commodities are of the type usually imported into the U.S.S.R., the significance of the recent pattern of procurement arises from the fact that the Soviet trade monopoly has been able to shift its buying from Western-oriented suppliers—Australia, Iran, South Africa, Norway—to more promising markets. Such shifts, moreover, can be made by the trade monopoly without regard to the usual commercial terms: price, quality, cost of transport, et cetera. It is known, furthermore, that some of these imported products were later reexported by the U.S.S.R. to other countries within the Soviet bloc.

B. Preempting markets of target countries

In a number of selected markets, the Soviet trade monopoly has been pressing its initial advantage to the point of establishing its commercial dominance.

First. In Afghanistan, for example, it has succeeded in preempting a growing share of that country's total trade—now over 30 percent.

Second. The U.S.S.R. has also extended its political leverage into Finland by way of raising its purchases to about 20 percent of that country's total exports.

Third. In Egypt, Russia has recently stepped up its purchases to a point where they now account for over 20 percent of all Egyptian exports.

Fourth. Similarly, the Soviet trade monopoly now takes 22 percent of Iceland's total export trade.

By way of getting these countries more deeply involved in the Soviet commercial orbit, the trade monopoly is conducting an aggressive export campaign. As a result, the position of the established western exporters to these markets is being seriously undermined by Soviet sales of similar goods at cutrate prices. A number of such target markets are now supplied by the U.S.S.R., for the first time, with trucks, autos, tractors, bulldozers, scrapers, cranes, machine tools, and oil equipment.

As far as can be ascertained from available trade reports, when the Soviet Government decides to introduce a particular line of machinery into an underdeveloped country, say in the Middle East, the regular Western supplier to that market finds it impossible to compete.

It is interesting to note, for example, in this connection, that the Yugoslav Government reported in late November 1958, that it was under severe pressure in the Middle East from the Soviet trade agents who "with uneconomic prices and other means are trying to push us out of the Arab market"—New York Times, November 30, 1958.

C. Making inroads into Western commodity markets

Agents of the Soviet trade monopoly have also stepped up their activities on a number of world commodity markets. The pressure to increase Soviet sales has been concentrated especially on petroleum products and nonferrous metals—tin, aluminum, nickel, and zinc. The effect in such cases has been to depress prices and to cut the export earnings of several small producer nations—for example, Bolivia, Malaya, and Indonesia, in the case of tin.

These practices have been characterized by Prime Minister Diefenbaker of Canada as "warfare in the marketplace," designed to undermine the economic strength of the free world. In this type of operation, said the Prime Minister, "the profits are measured not in the ledgers of commerce, but by the numbers of souls who trade their security and survival as freemen in the future for a temporary material advantage of the present"—New York Times, November 5, 1958.

Specifically, Canada has been affected by Soviet incursions into sensitive markets for several of its export commodities such as, among others, platinum, nickel, aluminum, soybean oil and meal.

D. Promoting the positive features of state trading

In its approach to the underdeveloped nations, the Soviet trade monopoly plays up a number of features in its state trading system calculated to appeal to the economic interest of these countries. The following features are stressed:

First. The state trading agencies of the U.S.S.R. do not require hard currencies for their exports. The purchase of Soviet goods can always be arranged on a barter basis, with the buying nation paying in goods rather than in currency.

Second. Soviet machinery is made available on the installment basis over periods as long as 5 years.

Third. Trade with the U.S.S.R. is particularly stable, because it is usually conducted on the basis of bilateral trade agreements that are renewed from year to year. Such agreements include specific lists of goods to be supplied by each side in the course of the year. Moreover, in the interest of stability, the U.S.S.R. often suggests 3- and 5-year agreements. Such formal lists have their special appeal to countries where governments are heavily involved in the conduct of foreign trade.

Fourth. The Soviet trade monopoly also recommends itself as a stabilizing influence on the prices of raw materials exported by the underdeveloped nations. As a token of its good intentions, it offers to sign purchase contracts at prices fixed to run over an extended period of time.

II. THE RECORD OF THE SOVIET TRADE MONOPOLY

The conduct of foreign commerce on a monopoly basis has enabled the U.S.S.R., over the years, to utilize trade as a weapon for the attainment of political objectives. Viewed from the other end, however, namely, from the standpoint of the nations trading with the U.S.S.R., the record of the Soviet trading system has been on the whole rather unsatisfactory. Its very utility for political pressure has made the trade monopoly a rather poor medium for the conduct of normal trade relations. More often than not it has prevented the development of a climate of mutual trust and simplified procedures. The experienced trader in the free world has always known that only the politically motivated deal is closed promptly. By contrast, ordinary commercial transactions are inordinately time consuming, being accompanied by excessive formalities and long periods of indecision.

While we need not here submit a full list of the liabilities of the Soviet trading monopoly, it may be useful, in the interest of perspective, to recall a few of the basic negative features of the Communist system of state trading as identified in a recent paper by a distinguished Western economist read before an East-West economic conference held in Rome in March 1958: [1]

1. The individual state-trading country of the Communist bloc does not usually aim at enlarging its international trade as such, but rather seeks to establish its other objectives and to make use of trade as a temporary convenience that may assist in carrying out some general policy objectives of the state.

2. Supplies placed on the market by a state-dominated economy tend to be marginal rather than the result of a line of continued production intended for the market. In the main, commodity trade is consciously used as a device for counteracting the mistakes of the planning mechanism and for compensating for the failures of the domestic plant to meet the goals set by the planners.

3. Because trade in a state-managed economy serves chiefly as a corrective to the planning mechanism, it tends to be discontinuous. Hence, trade which requires for its most effective operation a substantial specialized investment over a long period of time is discouraged. Trade tends to gravitate to: (a) Bulk commodities where added amounts can be easily absorbed by an already existing market; (b) large units of equipment in which sporadic transactions are normal.

4. One of the greatest obstacles to trade with countries employing a monopoly system is the ever-present risk of interruption in active contact that comes with each shift in the political orientation of the regime. Constant shifts of executive officials and of formal jurisdictions prevents maintaining long-term contact with the same individual or department. The central management of the economy, furthermore, leads to sudden changes of interest, to the launching of campaigns for dealing with an unexpected or unhedged surplus or shortage.

In short, practical experience with state trading over the past 40 years has not evolved the institution into an effective instrument for the normal, profit-motivated, and recurrent exchange of goods. What has attracted the Communist governments to this system, to be sure, is the very fact that it lends itself readily and pliably to manipulation by the political authority without the need to serve public notice, that is, by action taken through purely administrative channels. It can be used as a medium for rewarding friends and punishing enemies.

Even so, it is important to note that the instances of prompt action on the part of the monopoly in the world market have to be viewed as the exception rather than the rule in the functioning of the state trading apparatus. These are the instances in which a higher ranking authority bypasses the clogged channels of the Ministry of Foreign Trade. True, both agencies in question act in behalf of the same government, and both are free of any restraint in regard to cost. The fact remains that most of the spectacular commercial deals that have recently attracted our attention have involved the short-circuiting of the normal state trading machinery in the interest of a clear political advantage.

III. POSSIBLE DEFENSIVE MEASURES

At the present juncture in international relations, the United States may legitimately consider the adoption of certain measures to enable it to defend the national commercial interest in parts of the non-Communist world. There are two types of situations in which the U.S. Government could conceivably intervene to prevent the erosion of legitimate commercial rights:

One, in which pressure is brought to bear by the Soviet trade monopoly on an individual market in the form of uneconomic prices, or similar unfair practices, for the purpose of expelling from that market established United States sellers. The presumption in favor of action in such cases would be that the price cutting is only a temporary device employed by the trade monopoly to achieve the desired result. For the long term, even the Soviet trade monopoly is under orders to sell at the highest obtainable price.

Two, in which the purchasing power needed by some friendly countries for United States goods is frozen in the form of commodity surpluses that cannot be easily marketed to their normal nation-customers without the use of credit. Here the United States would be acting as an intermediary to keep trade flowing through ready channels, reduce the opportunity for Soviet pressure, and at the same time help unfreeze potential cash resources for the purchase of U.S. goods.

To cope with situations of this sort, it may be advisable to consider the establishment of the following instrumentalities:

First. An antidumping fund to enable American exporters to withstand Soviet attempts to expel them from established markets by the device of price cutting. Traders in this position may be regarded as victims of a planned Soviet political maneuver against the United States as a nation rather than against them as individuals.

Second. A U.S. commercial corporation to undertake commodity transaction with foreign countries which involve barter, credit, three-way transactions and other exchanges having a clear national economic or political objective that could not be pursued by a profit-motivated business firm.

In connection with the above, it is worthy of note that, according to the press, Representative THOMAS B. CURTIS disclosed before the American Management Association that he planned to reintroduce a bill in the next Congress calling for the creation of a U.S. trading corporation. It would grant financial assistance to American industries faced with unfair competition from the Soviet Union—New York Times, November 6, 1958.

IV. THE NEED FOR PERSPECTIVE

It would be shortsighted, however, to jump to the conclusion that the United States should establish a trading monopoly of its own to combat that of the Soviet Union, for to do so would be to recommend state trading to combat state trading. This is one case where fighting fire with fire could be disastrous.

The present foreign trade policy of the United States, which was inaugurated in the 1930's as an antidepression measure, has become too passive to offer an effective response to the Soviet trade threat. The present need is for a more vigorous foreign trade policy, one which, instead of confining itself to the multilateral reduction of trade barriers, would bring about a maximization of imports and exports by the countries of the non-Communist world. Such a policy, one that would be geared to the very real strategic needs of the United States, could be evolved only after a searching reexamination of our present and future international economic position with particular reference to the economic strategy of the Soviet Union.

BRIEF STATEMENT ON THE BULK-PURCHASE PROGRAM OF THE BRITISH GOVERNMENT

The British Government does not have a monopoly of foreign trade. During and after World War II, Great Britain has engaged in a form of state trading through the use of what are known as bulk-purchase contracts. These contracts, or bilateral agreements, concluded between the British Government and other governments, quasi-governmental bodies or private groups were concerned with the volume, the types, and the terms of exportation and importation of specific goods for a specified period of time.

Such contracts provided that Britain would buy a fraction or a specified quantity of the exportable surpluses of the commodity produced in a given country. The price of the commodity was usually subject to revision up to a definite maximum at certain stated intervals. A program of bulk purchase was continued after World War II because it was evident that food and other commodities would have to be rationed for a period of years and the Labor Party leaders felt that the retention of central purchase would give the most effective control of distribution of supplies within the country.

The bulk-purchase contracts served several purposes: First, they served to steer trade from the dollar area to the sterling area and to soft-currency areas; second, they tended to assure a fairly constant flow of imports at relatively favorable prices; since the contracts were ordinarily for a period of years they tended to promote price stability. They provided a certain amount of protection to British producers or investors since such contracts directed trade toward those British dominions or territories in which British capital was invested.

Usually the bulk-purchase contracts specified the exchange of an array of goods from Britain for raw materials and foodstuffs of equivalent value. Postwar contracts were for longer duration extending—in most cases—from 3 to 15 years.

Over 40 separate contracts were negotiated covering trade with other Commonwealth countries and possessions and with countries in Latin America, Eastern and Western Europe, and Asia. About one-half of all British imports were covered by such agreements up to 1950.

The Conservative election victory in 1950 resulted in a policy of honoring existing bulk-purchase contracts, but of negotiating no new ones.

State trading existed in the United Kingdom after World War II, but it coexisted with private trading and was not a monopoly. In recent years, the volume of state trading has declined.

I include here a letter I have received from Hon. Douglas Dillon, Under Secretary of State for Economic Affairs, and a letter from Harold Boeschenstein, Chairman of the Committee on World Economic Practices, Business Advisory Council, Department of Commerce, which is currently engaged in a study, at the request of President Eisenhower, of how we can meet the Russian trade threat effectively.

I also include an article by James Reston, of the New York Times, of December 2, 1958. I would like to say that in the development of this information I have had the assistance of Leon M. Herman, specialist in Soviet economics, Howard S. Piquet, senior specialist in international trade, and Elden E. Billings,

DEAR MR. THOMPSON: Many thanks for sending me a copy of your statement of December 16 on the Soviet economic offensive. I certainly agree with your thought that this is a matter which demands our full attention.

As you have pointed out, the situation with respect to the underdeveloped countries is especially urgent. Our best estimate is that the Sino-Soviet bloc has extended credits of almost $2.6 billion to these areas since 1954. More than 90 percent of this amount has gone to seven countries.

As of possible interest, I am enclosing a copy of my recent speech before the American Management Association, which deals with the subject of Soviet foreign economic policy.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN THOMPSON: I appreciate receiving the copy of your recent release on the Sino-Soviet economic offensive and concur that there is nothing more vital to our Nation than the manner in which we face up to this.

As you may know, I am a member of the committee, referred to in your release, created by the Business Advisory Council at the behest of the Government. Inasmuch as the work of the committee is not finished, I know you will understand why I should not comment at this time other than to say that such vigorous concern as yours is clearly needed among men in your position.

TRADE POLICY QUANDARY—SOVIET ECONOMIC DRIVE BEGINS DIVISION IN ADMINISTRATION ON COUNTERMOVES

(By James Reston)

WASHINGTON, December 1.—The annual battle over the Nation's foreign economic policy started today with the administration more divided than ever over how to deal with the Communist world's economic offensive.

When experts from seven Federal agencies finished testifying this afternoon before a House Ways and Means Subcommittee on the challenge of Communist trade policy, Chairman HALE BOGGS, of Louisiana, remarked: "They all recognize the danger but have no policy equal to it."

In the last few days several isolated incidents have illustrated the nature of the danger they were discussing:

Last week it was disclosed that the Soviet Government had concluded an agreement to sell $13,500,000 worth of benzene to the Dow Chemical Co., at a price equivalent to 24 to 25 cents a gallon. The current price in the United States is 31 cents a gallon.

Coincidentally, Augusto Frederico Schmidt, head of the Brazilian delegation to an inter-American economic conference in Washington, announced that his country was increasing its exports to the Communist nations. The British Commonwealth and the European Common Market nations, he observed, were "gradually closing their doors to our production," and the United States was not able to absorb Brazil's losses in those markets.

Premier Nikita S. Khrushchev, of the Soviet Union, in his latest maneuver to influence the political future of Berlin and Germany, held out once more the promise of a vast market for German products in the whole of the Communist world.

A high official of the United States Government, discussing the problem of meeting the Communist offensive, commented this afternoon:

"It is politically impossible for us to discuss in public the radical changes we shall have to make to deal effectively with the Soviet economic offensive.

A POLITICAL INSTRUMENT

"They control all of their foreign trade. They can use it as a political instrument regardless of cost. They can take losses to drive competition out of a given market precisely as large producers once were able to do to eliminate small competitors in this country.

"We have been discussing quietly inside our own Government for 6 months the need to establish an overseas trade monopoly to compete with the Soviet monopoly on equal terms, but this is so foreign to our normal way of doing business that we dare not mention it in public."

What the public hearings before Chairman BOGGS' Ways and Means Subcommittee demonstrated today was that the administration was just as divided on less radical policies than the creation of a monopoly for the sale of U.S. products overseas.

Henry Kearns, Assistant Secretary of Commerce, predicted that the administration would ask the next Congress to approve tax concessions to encourage increased private investment abroad.

DIVISION IN DEPARTMENT

It is known, however, that some of Mr. Kearns' superiors in the Commerce Department are opposed to dealing with the problem through tax concessions, and the Treasury Department's chief tax expert, Dan T. Smith, refused to go along with Mr. Kearns' prediction that the administration would ask for tax concessions.

The division within the administration on this subject reflects the conflict between those who have been stating the Nation's foreign policy objectives and those who have to tend the Nation's Treasury.

The State Department and the International Cooperation Administration, concerned with the dangers of Communist economic subversion, are prepared for a radical revision of U.S. foreign economic policy to meet what they regard as a radical attempt by the Communist nations to upset the whole pattern of foreign trade.

The Treasury Department, however, faced with a $12 billion deficit in the current fiscal year, tends to oppose any new programs that might reduce revenue and create a double standard of taxation.

To minimize this dilemma, the administration is now studying the possibility of reducing military aid to underdeveloped countries and increasing economic aid.

It is also discussing with Britain and the so-called Common Market countries of Western Europe ways and means of preventing the Common Market countries from discriminating against trade with countries outside the Common Market.

More than likely a compromise will be reached on this latter point under which the Common Market countries will agree not to raise tariffs against the United States, Britain, Switzerland, and other nations for a period of 18 months. But this again is regarded here as merely a postponement of the problem.

The main point under discussion here is that the Soviet Union and the other Communist countries are concerting their foreign trade policies for political purposes, while the administration and the other free governments of the West are divided over how to deal with a wholly new situation.

Chairman BOGGS was not hopeful tonight that his hearings would find a way out of this problem, but he planned to carry them on in order to make clear what the problem was.

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 14, 1959

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D.D., offered the following prayer:

God of all grace, who hath taught us that in quietness and in confidence shall be our strength: In the confusions of these times, so full of turmoil, help us to keep inviolate a little shrine of peace within, an altar of contrition, where the world's angry voices die, and where Thou alone art real.

So in this hallowed moment we turn to Thee for refuge from the noise and hurry of the world without, and from the tyranny of feverish moods and selfish motives within.

May we fear only to be disloyal to the best we know, to betray those who love and trust us, and to disappoint Thy expectations concerning us.

In a world where we see the fearful penalties of our foolish human separations and contentions, dedicate us in this anguished generation as builders of bridges across all the dividing gulfs which mar and rend this embattled earth. We ask it in the Redeemer's name. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. JOHNSON of Texas, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Monday, January 12, 1959, was dispensed with.

STATUS OF WATERSHED PROGRAMS IN TEXAS

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a report on the status of projects in Texas involving rivers and harbors, flood control, reservoirs, and watershed programs.

I feel strongly about the need and the justification for such projects. The future of Texas largely depends on how the State moves to resolve its water problems. These projects are investments which result in created assets, and I am hopeful that substantial progress can be made on them during this session of Congress.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PROCLAMATION BY GOVERNOR WILLIAMS OF MICHIGAN WELCOMING ALASKA INTO THE UNION

Mr. McNAMARA. Mr. President, one of the highlights of the opening day of the 86th Congress was the induction into the Senate of the two Senators from Alaska.

I am proud to have had a small part in making Alaska our 49th State. In voting for Alaska statehood, I was following the will of the people of Michigan.

The Governor of Michigan, the Honerable G. Mennen Williams, has issued a proclamation on behalf of the people of Michigan formally welcoming Alaska into the Union.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of Governor Williams' proclamation be printed in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the proclamation was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF MICHIGAN,
Executive Office, Lansing.

PROCLAMATION

The State of Alaska has, by Presidential Proclamation, just become the 49th State of the United States of America, an event of importance to every American.

Not since 1912 have Americans welcomed a new State into this indivisible Union of free people and democratic governments. It is particularly significant, therefore, that the admission of Alaska as our 49th State be heralded as the truly historical occasion that it is.

The new State of Alaska, with its rich endowments of breathtaking scenery, enterprising citizenry and vast natural resources, will take its just place as a leading and pioneering member of our Union of States.

Citizens of Michigan, in full knowledge of their own eventful history and bright future, can take pride in the development of Alaska, a development in which former citizens of Michigan participated. We can also view Alaska's future, as well as our own, with optimism and expectation for unprecedented growth and prosperity.

Therefore, I, G. Mennen Williams, Governor of the State of Michigan, do hereby extend, on behalf of all the people of our great State, this sincere and hearty welcome to the great State of Alaska as the 49th member of the United States of America, and wish its citizens happiness and prosperity in the years ahead.

Given under my hand and the great seal of the State of Michigan, this 6th day of January in the Year of Our Lord 1959, and of the Commonwealth the 122d.

G. MENNEN WILLIAMS,
Governor.

By the Governor:
[SEAL] JAMES M. HAN,
Secretary of State.

NATIONAL JUNIOR ACHIEVEMENT WEEK

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, last year I submitted a concurrent resolution requesting the President to declare a week in late January as National Junior Achievement Week. That resolution passed both Houses in time for the President to make his proclamation. I am submitting a similar resolution today, and I am hopeful that we can get prompt action on it. My resolution authorizes and requests the President to issue a proclamation designating the week of January 25 through 31 as National Junior Achievement Week.

Mr. President, the work of the Junior Achievement organization is well known to the Members of this body. Through Junior Achievement companies, young people of high school age participate directly in free enterprise institutions, learning the skills and responsibilities that go to make up competitive business life.

There are 3,900 Junior Achievement companies organized in the country today, and more than 65,000 teen-age participants. Twelve thousand adult businessmen are on hand to advise the young workers.

Testimony to the strong community support behind the Junior Achievement companies is the fact that 300,000 people owned shares of stock in them during 1958. These shares are paid off at the end of each year, and the companies are then completely reorganized. In this way, young people coming into the companies on the first of the year experience the entire business cycle from the beginning.

It is a fine program, Mr. President, a program meriting congressional recognition for the splendid work it is doing for America's youth.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The concurrent resolution will be received and appropriately referred.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 3), submitted by Mr. JOHNSON of Texas, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

Whereas it was the initiative, the sense of individual dignity, and the determination to mold their own futures that motivated those who founded this Nation; and

Whereas Junior Achievement, Incorporated, through its learning-by-doing program, is inculcating those ideals in American youth by helping them to set up and operate their own small-scale business enterprises; and

Whereas their experience in running Junior Achievement companies will provide these young people with a heightened understanding of the privileges and duties of citizenship and better prepare them to assume the responsibilities of community leadership; and

Whereas thousands of American businessmen voluntarily give unstintingly of their time, their counsel, and their experience for the benefit of the members of Junior Achievement; and

Whereas it is understood that the week beginning January 25, 1959, and ending January 31, 1959, will be observed as National Junior Achievement Week: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President of the United States is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation designating the week of January 25, 1959, through January 31, 1959, as National Junior Achievement Week and urging all citizens of our country to salute the activities of Junior Achievers and their volunteer adult advisers through appropriate ceremonies.

COUNTRY LIFE COMMISSION

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill for the establishment of a Country Life Commission.

The purpose of such a Commission would be to evaluate long-range trends in agriculture, and make recommendations for better resolving problems and providing an improved farm program for the future.

Over the years, there have been many far-reaching changes in agriculture, including farm-to-city shifts in population, technological developments, location of industries in rural areas, and other trends that are bringing new challenges. These changes are resulting in tremendous social and economic changes in farm life.

The Commission, as proposed, would be composed of 25 members, appointed by the President, including 10 Members of Congress—5 from the Senate and 5 from the House of Representatives. It would be required to report and make its recommendations to the President and the Congress within 2 years after the enactment of the legislation and the appointment of the members of the Commission.

I am aware, of course, that—in recognition of the real need for this long-range approach to resolving our agricultural problems—there are other proposals under consideration for establishment of such a Country Life Commission. Our colleagues on the Agricultural Committee, of course, will want to give proportionate consideration to these differing proposals—so as to come up with the best kind of Commission.

I hope, however, that early action will be taken on this proposed legislation.

From all evidence, it appears that our agricultural problems will also be long range, since unfortunately, there appears to be no immediate solution to the situation. Therefore, it is particularly desirable that such a Commission be established, as soon as possible.

I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 265) to establish a Commission on Country Life, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. WILEY, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

Be it enacted, etc.

DECLARATION OF PURPOSE

SECTION 1. Because (1) economic and social changes are profoundly affecting all phases of human life and endeavor in country communities; (2) there is currently a need for greater awareness on the part of all people, their organizations, and their leadership concerning the interrelatedness of rural and urban forces shaping the new country community; (3) rural organizations and leadership are in the need of a critical and thoughtful appraisal of the forces shaping the new country community; (4) in a time of great social and economic adjustment spokesmen for country people must be encouraged to safeguard the opportunity for full development of individual and local community initiative; and (5) there is a need for an approach to the changing country scene which will provide the Nation with a body of objective facts, thoughtful appraisal, and a value base to help its people make wise decisions in the area of country living, it is therefore determined to be necessary to establish a commission to develop this approach, advise, and recommend with regard to problems, needs, probable courses of action or other appropriate means which will help the Nation to act wisely in this time of unprecedented change in country community living.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, to provide other Senators who may be interested the opportunity of joining in cosponsorship of this bill, I ask that it lie on the table during this week. Any colleagues who wish to cosponsor the measure are warmly invited to do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the bill will lie on the desk, as requested by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a statement which I have prepared on the bill be printed at this point in the body of the RECORD, following the text of the bill itself.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR WILEY

The complexion of country living, during recent years, has changed in many respects.

First. There have been tremendous shifts from rural to urban living. In 1850, for example, only 15 percent of the population lived in urban areas; in 1950—100 years later—it had risen to 65 percent.

Second. Today more and more farmers hold off-the-farm jobs. In Wisconsin, about 35 percent of our farmers hold such jobs.

Third. Production patterns are changing. In 1958, because of technological advancements, crop production climbed 11 percent above the previous record set in 1948 and matched in 1956 and 1957. This was accomplished on acreage reduced sharply because of Government planting control and retention of land in the soil bank.

Fourth. The costs of our agriculture program are high. Currently, we are spending about $4.8 billion annually. A more realistic long-range plan may well help to reduce these costs in the future.

Urban folks, too, have a stake in maintaining a healthy agricultural economy. We recognize, of course, that our farmers produce the food for the Nation—its lifeblood. A great many of our cities are only a few days away from starvation.

In addition, we have learned from unhappy experiences that economic downtrends in agriculture are soon reflected elsewhere in the economy.

Overall, there is a real need for an improved farm program to benefit both producers and consumers alike.

Although similar proposals have been presented to Congress in the past, unfortunately no final action has been taken. The facts are that farmers are still receiving a disproportionately low share of the national income; predictions indicate that income may drop 5 to 10 percent this year; and a healthy agriculture is good for the Nation.

The establishment of a Country Life Commission to attempt to cope more effectively with long-range problems and trends could make a real contribution, I believe, toward an improved farm program.

ADDITIONAL CAPITAL GRANTS FOR URBAN RENEWAL AND REDEVELOPMENT PROJECTS

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I introduce a bill to authorize additional capital grants for urban renewal and redevelopment projects, and to encourage participation by the States in slum clearance and prevention, and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. President, this bill proposes a 6-year urban renewal and redevelopment program under which from $3.3 billion to more than $4 billion in public funds could be made available for the urgent task of preventing the further decay of the cities of America.

It would provide a minimum of $1.5 billion in Federal capital grants over the 6-year period, and this amount could be increased to as much as $2.1 billion in the discretion of the President. The remaining public funds would be contributed by States and municipalities which take advantage of the program.

Additionally, the bill would provide priorities in Federal capital grants to projects in States which assist local communities in meeting the expense of required local costs; and would gradually reduce the Federal share of urban renewal costs, now 66⅔ percent or more, to an eventual 50 percent, with States and their municipalities paying the remainder.

Connecticut and several other forward-looking States have recognized the stark necessity of helping their cities stave off municipal bankruptcy through urban renewal and redevelopment. My bill is frankly designed to encourage other States to follow their lead, and thus make possible a greater amount of public funds for urban renewal than will be possible if the Federal Government is left to bear a disproportionate share of the burden.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill may be printed following these remarks, together with the text of an address delivered by me before a luncheon meeting of the American Society of Civil Engineers in New York City on October 13, 1958, in which the background of urban renewal and the philosophy behind the bill were outlined.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill, together with the address, will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 266) to authorize additional capital grants for urban renewal and redevelopment projects, and to encourage participation by the States in slum clearance and prevention, introduced by Mr. BUSH, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Section 101(b) of the Housing Act of 1949 is amended by adding at the end thereof a new sentence as follows: "The Administrator shall particularly encourage the utilization of local public agencies established by the States to operate on a statewide basis in behalf of smaller communities within the State, whenever that arrangement provides an effective solution of community development or redevelopment problems in such communities, and is approved by resolution or ordinance of the governing bodies of the affected communities."

SEC. 2. The first sentence of section 103(b) of the Housing Act of 1949 is amended to read as follows: "The Administrator, on and after July 1, 1949, may, with the approval of the President, contract to make capital grants, with respect to projects assisted under this title, and to make grants pursuant to subsection (c) of this section, aggregating not to exceed $1,250,000,000, which limit shall be increased by $250,000,000 on July 1 in each of the fiscal years 1960 through 1965; except that any such authorized increase may be increased by additional amounts aggregating not more than $100,000,000 in any fiscal year upon a determination by the President that such additional amounts are necessary to stimulate economic activity and to carry out the urban renewal objectives of this title: Provided, That the amount of capital grants contracted for under this title prior to July 1, 1966, shall not exceed an aggregate of $3,350,000,000."

SEC. 3. Section 103(a) of the Housing Act of 1949 is hereby amended by striking out the second sentence and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "The aggregate of such capital grants with respect to all the projects of a local public agency on which contracts for capital grants have been made under this title shall not exceed the sum of the applicable percentages of the respective net project costs of such projects. Such percentages, which shall apply to all projects receiving initial Federal recognition during the period specified, shall be 66⅔ per centum for the period prior to July 1, 1960; 60 per centum for the period between July 1, 1960, and June 30, 1961, inclusive; 55 per centum for the period between July 1, 1961, and June 30, 1962, inclusive; and 50 per centum for any time thereafter: Provided, That the percentage for any project for which no planning grant is received and retained by the local public agency and which the Administrator, at the request of such agency, may approve on a three-fourths capital grant basis shall be 75 per centum, or such lesser percentage as the Administrator determines to be generally consistent with the percentage of net project costs hereunder applicable at the time to projects not so approved."

SEC. 4. Section 104 of the Housing Act of 1949 is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 104. Every contract for capital grants under this title shall require local grants-in-aid in connection with the project involved which, together with the local grants-in-aid to be provided in connection with all other projects of the local public agency on which contracts for capital grants have theretofore been made, will be at least equal to the difference between the aggregate net project costs involved and the sum described in the second sentence of section 103(a)."

SEC. 5. Section 106 of the Housing Act of 1949 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(h) Without limiting any authority otherwise provided in this title, any local grants-in-aid may be furnished by the State government as distinguished from other local public agencies, as herein defined. In making capital grants available for projects, priority shall be given a project in a State where the State government has furnished or contracted to furnish local grants-in-aid to the project in an amount which equals or exceeds one-half the total required amount."

The address presented by Mr. BUSH is as follows:

THE FUTURE OF URBAN RENEWAL

(By Hon. PRESCOTT BUSH, U.S. Senator)

I welcome this opportunity to speak before the American Society of Civil Engineers on the subject of urban renewal and redevelopment. It is an honor and a privilege to appear before a group of professional men who can play an important part in shaping the future of this program which I consider to be one of the most vital long-range projects which has been undertaken in the United States.

You are all familiar with the failure of the 85th Congress to enact legislation to ensure the continuation of urban renewal. A bill to provide $2.1 billion in Federal capital grants over a 6-year period toward the herculean task of cleaning up the slums of America and preventing the further decay of our cities was reported to the Senate floor by the Committee on Banking and Currency, of which I have been a member ever since I entered the Senate 6 years ago. Although the proposed 6-year program was reduced to $1.8 billion on the Senate floor, the bill died in the House of Representatives.

This setback was of concern to all of us who are enthusiastic supporters of this imaginative, constructive program which can mean so much in creating a better, happier life for many thousands of American families and in saving hundreds of communities from municipal bankruptcy.

Why did it occur? I shall discuss what I consider to be the reasons a little later on, but first, perhaps, we should consider the size, scope and nature of the program which has been developed to meet the problems of urban slums and urban blight.

More and more communities today are seeking an answer to the problems stemming from slums and blight through participation in the federally assisted urban renewal program.

At the end of June, this year, 328 localities—large and small—had undertaken a total of 543 urban renewal projects. This demonstrates, it seems to me, an awareness across the Nation of the benefits that can be derived from sound urban renewal.

Though the federally assisted urban-renewal program is being carried out on a nationwide scale, it is completely apparent that the answer to the problem of urban renewal is basically local—local in initiative, local in management, local in achievement.

The prime Federal function in urban renewal is to help the community help itself through financial and technical assistance.

Under the slum-clearance provisions of the Housing Act of 1949, many communities undertook to do away with unsightly scars on the faces of our cities and are now, with Federal assistance, clearing wornout slum areas for a wide variety of new uses—residential, commercial, industrial, public, and semipublic.

But, as originally conceived, this was only a partial answer. The President's Advisory Committee on Government Housing Policies and Programs in 1953, found that new slums were forming faster than old ones were being cleared. This committee called for a program to prevent slums, as well as to clear them.

This required not only Federal assistance but also full-scale community programs to solve the problem.

"Federal assistance," President Eisenhower said, "is justified for communities which face up to the problem of neighborhood decay and undertake long-range programs directed to its prevention."

Acting on the Committee's recommendations, the President, in January 1954, called on the Congress for legislation that would aid localities to (1) prevent the spread of blight into good areas; (2) rehabilitate areas that can be economically restored; and (3) continue clearance and redevelopment of areas that cannot be saved.

Congress responded with the Housing Act of 1954.

That act opened the way to a new total approach to end blight as well as clear slums by using a wide range of community, private, and Federal resources in a strongly unified effort.

With the urban renewal tools made available to them by the 1954 act and subsequent legislation, American communities now can aim at total community improvement rather than confining themselves to the elimination of pockets of slums here and there.

In fact, major Federal assistance in the form of loans and capital grants, special FHA mortgage insurance, and public housing are available only after the locality prepares an acceptable workable program blueprinting the action that must be taken for overall community improvement. Under the workable program, the community sets its own goals toward which it must work in order to obtain Federal recertification of its program and maintain eligibility for Federal assistance. The community itself carries out all the steps involved in the required elements of a workable program.

Federally assisted urban renewal today is a two-pronged approach: First, clearance and redevelopment of slums gone beyond repair and rehabilitation; and second, conservation of savable dwellings and neighborhoods.

All the slum clearance provisions of the 1949 act have been retained in the present program. The vital additions include specific tools for rehabilitation and conservation.

Current Federal assistance includes such aids as: loans and capital grants for urban renewal projects; planning, informational, and technical help; liberalized FHA mortgage insurance; and financial aid for low-rent public housing. I shall later discuss these in somewhat greater detail.

Federal aid for urban renewal projects may be given only to local public agencies duly authorized by State and local law to carry out the various activities involved. A local public agency may be—according to individual local circumstances—a specially created redevelopment agency, a local housing authority, or a city or county itself.

In some localities, two local agencies, such as the city and the redevelopment agency, may have to participate jointly in certain types of projects.

An urban renewal project, according to the law, may embrace diversified local efforts directed at the elimination and prevention of slums and blight, all in accordance with the urban renewal plan for the area.

Specific activities of an urban renewal project may include these:

1. Carrying out plans for a program of voluntary repair and rehabilitation;

2. Acquisition of slum areas or deteriorated or deteriorating areas, whether residential or nonresidential;

3. Acquisition of predominantly open land—such as arrested subdivisions—which, because of deterioration or other basic faults, impede sound community growth;

4. Acquisition, preparation, and disposition of open land needed for sound community growth—outside an urban renewal area—for predominantly residential purposes. No capital grants may be made for such areas, which are intended for use in relocating families displaced by the local urban renewal programs.

5. Acquisition—in areas where the prime need is conservation or rehabilitation—of individual parcels of land and structures thereon which must be razed to prevent the spread of blight or provide land for needed public facilities;

6. Demolition and removal of buildings and improvements after proper relocation of onsite tenants;

7. Installation, construction, or reconstruction—in the urban renewal area—of streets, utilities, parks, playgrounds, and other improvements necessary to carry out urban renewal objectives;

8. Selling or leasing any acquired land—for development or redevelopment by private enterprise or public agencies—at its fair value in accordance with the urban renewal plan.

It is important to note that no Federal funds may be expended for the construction or improvement of any building in an urban renewal project. FHA mortgage insurance, however, is available under section 220 of the National Housing Act for rehabilitation of dwellings or the construction of housing in an urban renewal area.

I mentioned, a few moments ago, the urban renewal plan. The law requires a plan—locally devised—for each urban renewal project. The urban renewal plan must indicate proposed land acquisition, demolition and removal of structures, redevelopment, improvements, and contemplated rehabilitation. It must also show any zoning and planning changes, land uses, maximum population densities, building requirements, and its relationship to local objectives.

These objectives include such items as appropriate land uses, improved traffic, public transportation, public utilities, recreational and community facilities, and other public improvements.

Turning to specific urban renewal aids, let us consider first loans and capital grants.

A loan covers expenses attendant to carrying out the urban renewal project. It is repaid to the Federal Government with interest.

A capital grant is designed to defray up to two-thirds—in some cases three-fourths—of the net loss incurred in carrying out a project. The community must put up the remainder of the deficit.

This local share can be supplied through any or all of the following methods: cash, donations of land, certain types of work on the site, and supporting public facilities.

Concerning FHA mortgage insurance, the 1954 act amended the National Housing Act so as to liberalize the scope of such insurance in several ways. Particularly important to urban renewal are two new FHA programs under sections 220 and 221 of the National Housing Act.

Section 220 authorizes special mortgage insurance for the construction or rehabilitation of sales and rental housing in urban renewal areas in accordance with urban renewal plans.

For the benefit of families displaced by urban renewal programs or other public undertakings, section 221 permits mortgage insurance to provide low-cost private housing—sales and rental—through new construction and/or rehabilitation.

Federally assisted low-rent public housing, first authorized in 1937, is available in connection with the urban renewal program to meet requirements of low-income families displaced by urban renewal activities or other public action. Such families have first priority for public housing vacancies.

Another aid is the urban renewal service. Through this service communities may obtain on-the-scene technical and professional aid for preparing local urban renewal programs. Technical bulletins and other informational materials also are included in the assistance given by this service.

All in all, communities have access to a rounded supply of urban renewal tools. It is up to them to take the initiative in using them.

Why did this program, with so many desirable features, fail to win the support of the 85th Congress?

The primary reason, in my judgment, was a realization of the enormous costs to the Federal Government it will involve in the years ahead, and an unwillingness to commit the Federal Government to financial burdens of that magnitude at a time when in the current fiscal year we face a $12 billion deficit.

It is my considered opinion that unless State governments participate substantially in underwriting the public costs of urban renewal the program faces an extremely uncertain future.

What is the probable magnitude of the public costs involved in cleaning up America's slums, and preventing the further decay of our cities?

The bill reported to the Senate by the Committee on Banking and Currency would have committed the Federal Government to pledge an average of $350 million a year, for a 6-year period, beginning with the current fiscal year of 1959, toward the cost of acquiring and clearing sites for urban renewal and redevelopment projects. The total of $2.1 billion was a large sum, but it represented only a fraction of the staggering costs of slum clearance and urban renewal which face the cities of America.

There are no thoroughly reliable estimates of the total public costs that will be involved, but the President's Advisory Committee on Housing, in 1953, made a rough calculation that at a minimum $24 billion in public funds would be required for urban renewal and redevelopment.

Where is the public money coming from?

At present, the Federal Government pledges itself to contribute two-thirds of acquiring and clearing the sites of an urban renewal project—the "net project cost"—and the locality provides the remaining one-third in cash or in public improvements. To date, the Federal Government has made capital grant reservations totaling about $1.2 billion.

With rare exceptions, the State governments have contributed nothing.

We hear a great deal spoken on the Senate floor about "States rights." But, States rights carry with them States responsibilities, and if the States do not accept their responsibilities their rights will wither away. Each evasion by the States of their responsibility to carry out an obligation of government due their people, or the municipalities which are their creatures, weakens State governments and further concentrates power and authority in the Central Government here in Washington.

The administration had proposed a gradual reduction of the Federal share of the cost of urban renewal projects, and a corresponding increase in the contributions by local or State governments. The administration recommended that the Federal Government's share be reduced to 60 percent on July 1, 1959; to 55 percent on July 1, 1960; and to 50 percent on July 1, 1961, with the local or State share being increased accordingly up to a matching 50 percent.

This recommendation, to my regret, was rejected by a majority of the Committee on Banking and Currency and was not even considered by the Senate. It was opposed during the hearings by representatives of the mayors of America who testified it would be exceedingly difficult to increase taxes, or issue municipal bonds, to provide larger local contributions.

I can agree with the mayors' contention—with some reservations. Property taxes in many communities in my own State of Connecticut are already high. Some communities have exhausted their capacity to issue bonds. I presume similar conditions exist throughout the Nation. But, on the other hand, there are many communities throughout the United States which base their property taxes on unrealistically low assessments, and there are many which can issue long-term bonds which, because of the advantage of tax exempt status, bear low interest rates which compare very favorably with interest rates on U.S. Treasury obligations with comparable maturities. Moreover, I am confident that well-planned urban renewal and redevelopment projects will result in increased tax revenues which the cities could well use—directly, or indirectly in support of bond issues—to pay a modest increase in the cost of their urban renewal programs.

So, I cannot accept in its entirety the argument that cities cannot afford a modest increase in their contributions to the urban renewal programs which are of such great direct benefit to themselves.

However, I believe that if the Federal share is gradually reduced, the greater part of the corresponding increase in the local contributions should be borne by the State governments which, with extremely few exceptions, now contribute nothing at all.

I raised this point during the hearings conducted by the subcommittee on Housing, and was met with the argument by the mayors' representatives that it would be impossible to persuade the legislatures of the several States to authorize State contributions to urban renewal programs because, it was alleged, the legislatures are dominated by rural members with little sympathy for the problems of the cities.

The able member of the subcommittee, the distinguished junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK] also made this allegation many times during the course of the hearings. I quote from a colloquy he had with Mayor Lee, of New Haven, which appears on page 496:

"Senator CLARK. Of course, we have a lot of State legislatures where the representation formula is such that the urban communities are pretty badly underrepresented. Have you found that to be the case in Connecticut?

"Mr. LEE. That is the case, except this is a rather extraordinary development in Connecticut. Our legislature is rural dominated, as are most legislatures, but Senator, the great thing was in this last session that the legislation which was introduced in urban renewal and passed was introduced by the Republicans in the house, which is the rural section of our legislature. It was a very pleasant and totally unexpected development."

The Wooster Square project in New Haven is one of the first, if not the first, urban redevelopment projects in Connecticut to receive assistance from the State under the new legislation to which Mayor Lee referred. The statute authorizes the State of Connecticut to pay one-half of the local cost of urban renewal and redevelopment projects. Under existing law, this means that the Federal Government pays two-thirds of the net project cost, and the State and the city pay one-sixth each. If the cost-sharing formula were modified as the administration suggested, the division of costs on projects initiated in the fiscal year beginning on July 1, 1959, would have been as follows: Federal, 60 percent; State, 20 percent; locality, 20 percent. In the fiscal year beginning on July 1, 1960, it would have been Federal, 55 percent; State, 22.5 percent; locality, 22.5 percent; and in the fiscal year beginning on July 1, 1961, and in subsequent fiscal years it would have been Federal, 50 percent; State and locality, 25 percent each.

It will be noted that under a Federal-State-local cost-sharing plan the contributions of the local community would be less than they are now required to make under the present arrangement in which costs are divided solely between the Federal Government and the locality. Even when the Federal contribution was reduced to the minimum, 50 percent, the cities would be paying only one-fourth as compared with the present one-third.

Other legislation enacted by the General Assembly of Connecticut at its special session this year authorized the State to pay one-half the cost of commercial and industrial redevelopment projects for which no Federal assistance is presently available. A third statute enables the State development commission to provide technical assistance to communities in the preparation of capital improvement programs.

The experience in my own State makes it impossible for me to accept the defeatist argument made before our committee by the representatives of American mayors. I have urged the mayors to undertake a vigorous campaign to convince State legislatures of the imperative need for urban renewal, and of the necessity of State contributions toward the costs.

This, admittedly, is a more difficult task than coming to Washington and asking for ever-increasing Federal contributions, but it should be done and, if accomplished, would insure the future of urban renewal.

Unless it is done, I fear that the day will come when the Federal Government will reduce, and perhaps eliminate entirely, its contributions because of other demands upon the Treasury. As a member of the Committee on Armed Services, I am painfully aware of the rapidly skyrocketing costs of defense in a period of onrushing technological developments. Defense costs are already enormous, and the prospects are that they will be steadily rising in the years immediately ahead. We ended the fiscal year 1958 with a Federal deficit close to $3 billion. In the current fiscal year, we have had a Federal expense budget of $80 billion and we are told on good authority that the deficit will approximate $12 billion. Under these circumstances, urban renewal will continue to be an inviting target for those searching for ways to cut the budget.

But if the States participate in the costs of urban renewal, there will be less inclination to reduce the Federal contributions below their present level, and State assistance in the effort to clean up slums and prevent the spread of urban blight will make possible a larger total program than otherwise could be carried out.

I urge you, gentlemen, when you return to your home States, to help bring about a greater public understanding of the need for urban renewal and redevelopment, and of the need for participation in its costs by all levels of government—State, as well as Federal and local.

ALLEVIATION OF UNEMPLOYMENT IN CERTAIN DEPRESSED AREAS

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to establish an effective program to alleviate conditions of substantial and persistent unemployment and underemployment in economically depressed areas.

This subject is not new to the Senate. A bill for this purpose, combining the features of several proposals, was passed by the Senate last year. It was considerably amended in the House—and in its final form was pocket-vetoed by the President on September 6, 1958.

The President's veto of S. 3683 hinged upon differences as to application and operation of such a program; there was no argument as to need. The administration has consistently urged the adoption of legislation to render economic assistance to areas of chronic unemployment.

The proposal which I submit today attempts to meet some of the President's objections, while at the same time insisting upon sufficient funds and scope to constitute an adequate program.

Mr. President, the need for such a program in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania has not diminished in the past year. Unemployment has increased 10 percent on a statewide basis in the past month. Regional unemployment statistics for seriously affected areas in Pennsylvania, indicate sizable increases in unemployment, over a year ago, to as high as 16.8 percent of the labor force. These are not temporary maladjustments, but continuing problems of economic distress.

The greater part of our country is enjoying a high degree of prosperity, with indications that we will forge ahead to even greater business and economic recovery. For certain areas and communities to be caught in the backwash of this tide, through no fault of their own, is a threat to our way of life.

We need the active participation of every American citizen in our national welfare. We must extend to these areas of continued unemployment and underemployment the financial and technical assistance needed to put themselves back on the track of national prosperity and well-being.

Mr. President, I will not take up the time of the Senate for a long discussion of this subject at this time. I ask unanimous consent that a brief analysis of the salient points of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the analysis will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 268) to establish an effective program to alleviate conditions of substantial and persistent unemployment and underemployment in certain economically depressed areas, introduced by Mr. SCOTT, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The analysis presented by Mr. SCOTT is as follows:

BRIEF ANALYSIS OF AREA REDEVELOPMENT BILL INTRODUCED BY SENATOR HUGH SCOTT

1. Authorizes appropriation of a total of $200 million for a revolving loan fund: $100 million for industrial areas; $50 million for rural areas; and $50 million for public facilities. This compares with $50 million provided in last year's administration bill, but is $75 million less than the bill vetoed. (The bill does not provide for outright grants for public facilities, a provision to which the President objected.)

2. Provides for maximum Federal loan participation of 50 percent; minimum State or local government participation of 10 percent; and minimum participation from nongovernmental sources of 5 percent. The President had objected to Federal participation in loans up to 65 percent in the bill vetoed.

3. Provides for loans for a period of 30 years, compared with the 40-year limit in the vetoed bill.

4. Places program under Department of Commerce which has primary responsibility for business and industrial development. Administrator will have Assistant Secretary status.

5. Authorizes the Secretary of Commerce to determine realistic rates of interest on all loans.

6. Authorizes loans to industrial areas with the following unemployment levels: 15 percent unemployment for 6 months; or 12 percent for 1 year; or 9 percent for 15 out of 18 months; 6 percent for 18 out of 24 months—preceding date of application. There are different criteria for rural areas and public facilities loans.

7. Contains a special urban renewal section to permit Housing and Home Finance Agency to give financial assistance to urban renewal projects in municipalities, without regard to the predominantly residential requirement.

8. Contains Davis-Bacon Act provision to assure prevailing rate of wage and 40-hour week on contracts under area redevelopment.

9. Authorizes technical assistance of $3.5 million for surveys and other evaluation studies.

10. Requires the State or its instrumentality to establish local redevelopment plans.

11. Establishes a Cabinet-level Advisory Board and 25-member Public Advisory Committee.

EQUALIZATION OF PAY OF RETIRED MEMBERS OF UNIFORMED SERVICES

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, on April 29, 1958, the Senate passed H.R. 11470, the military pay raise bill, which became Public Law 422. It was my opinion, at that time, as it is at the present, that the bill was inequitable in that it provided a different pay increase for retired officers than for those on active duty and who retired after enactment of the bill.

At that time this difference of award was discussed here on the floor, but I did not offer an amendment since I was fearful that it might jeopardize passage of the bill.

Last year I cosponsored S. 4207, designed to remedy the discrimination embodied in Public Law 422. Today I am introducing an identical bill, which provides that hereafter the retirement pay of those members of the armed services retired on or before May 31, 1958, shall not be less than that provided for members of the uniformed services of equal rank and length of service retired subsequent to that date.

Under Public Law 422, those retiring after June 1, 1958, from active status are paid under the traditional percent of current active duty pay. Thus, a major general or rear admiral with 30 years' service, retiring after June 1, 1958, draws his retired pay at 75 percent of the new active duty rate of $1,350 per month, as against the pay drawn by a major general retiring on or before May 31, which allows only a 6-percent increase over the old retired pay of $807 a month. This amounts to $1,014 per month retirement pay for a major general or rear admiral now on active duty, who may not have commanded more than a battalion in war, as against a retired major general drawing $848 per month who commanded a division or task force during World War II and Korea.

Why there should be this disparity in award of compensation to retirees from the same services with the same ranks—based on only the discriminating factor that one retired on May 31, 1958, and the other retired on June 1, 1958? To me it is difficult to understand the reasons we are now penalizing the very men whose outstanding wartime leadership should entitle them to first consideration.

This bill completes the system of compensation advocated by the Cordiner report, carrying out the recommendation that retirement scales for all retirees be recomputed each time the pertinent laws are changed. It will offer the incentive needed to attract outstanding young men into the services, assuring them that their retirement programs will be kept abreast of current economic conditions. It has the support of the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the Adjutants General Association, the National Guard Association, the Regular Veterans Association, the Catholic War Veterans Association, the Jewish War Veterans of the United States, the Naval Reserve Association, the Veterans of World War I of the United States, and numerous other service and veteran groups.

Only in this way can a fair and equal system of retirement be maintained.

I ask unanimous consent that the bill lie on the desk for 3 days, in order that other Senators interested in the subject may subscribe their names to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will lie on the desk, as requested by the Senator from Arizona.

The bill (S. 269) to equalize the pay of retired members of the uniformed services, introduced by Mr. GOLDWATER (for himself and Senators BEALL, HOLLAND, MANSFIELD, MORSE, MURRAY, PASTORE, THURMOND, ENGLE, MUNDT, HUMPHREY, and MOSS) was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Armed Services.

CONSTRUCTION OF BURNS CREEK DAM, IDAHO

Mr. DWORSHAK. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, and my colleague, the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. CHURCH], I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to authorize the construction of the Burns Creek Dam and powerplant in Bonneville County, Idaho. The bill which we introduce is identical in form with one considered by this body and passed in the 85th Congress. Unfortunately, the other body did not have an opportunity to consider it and it died at the expiration of the 85th Congress.

The bill in the form in which it is now introduced has been reported favorably upon by the Interior Department and by the Bureau of the Budget. The Burns Creek Dam and Reservoir and powerplant would be located on the Snake River in Bonneville County, Idaho, about 30 miles downstream from Palisades Dam. It would be integrated electrically, hydraulically, and financially with the existing Palisades reclamation project. The prime purpose of this development is reregulation of releases from Palisades, but in addition 100,000 acre-feet of its 234,000 acre-feet of reservoir capacity will be available for long-term holdover irrigation storage and a 90,000-kilowatt powerplant will be built. The holdover storage would in effect provide insurance water to be used during extreme drought periods. All of it has been contracted for use on the irrigated acres along the Snake River upstream from Bliss, Idaho, by the users who heretofore have contracted for Palisades water.

The reregulation of Palisades releases will make possible an integrated operation which will more than double the prime power output from the Palisades powerplant alone. A very favorable cost benefit ratio has been reported.

The bill has the virtually unanimous support of the water users, the power users and all other interested parties in the State of Idaho.

My colleague and I intend to urge the Interior Committee to hold hearings promptly so that action in this body can be concluded at an early date.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DWORSHAK. I yield.

Mr. CHURCH. I concur and subscribe wholeheartedly to the remarks of my distinguished colleague in the introduction of the bill. I am proud to sponsor it with him this year as I did in the last Congress. I know of no project which is so well able to stand on its own merits as this one, not only in terms of the supplemental irrigation benefits, but also in terms of the power it will produce, as well as in fiscal terms. It will not be a cost to the Federal Government. Rather, it will be an additional investment in the development of reclamation and related purposes which will more than repay the Treasury with interest, from power revenues alone, within a reasonable pay-out period. I hope the Senate will speedily pass the bill, as it did 2 years ago.

Mr. DWORSHAK. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 281) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to construct, operate, and maintain a reregulating reservoir and other works at the Burns Creek site in the upper Snake River Valley, Idaho, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. DWORSHAK (for himself and Mr. CHURCH), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

CONSTRUCTION OF AGRICULTURAL BUILDINGS

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, on behalf of myself and the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill I consider important to the adequate and orderly development of our agricultural programs.

This bill would authorize the Administrator of General Services to carry out a program for the construction of county agricultural buildings in counties where agriculture is the predominant industry, and where Federal, State, and local offices administer programs involving the welfare of our farm population. The bill would authorize the Federal Government to contribute up to 30 percent of the construction costs of such buildings, and in unusual cases, when it is established that counties are unable to supply a full share of the construction costs, the Government would be authorized to contribute up to 50 percent.

Mr. President, in Arkansas agriculture is a predominant industry, and in many counties agricultural activities of the Federal, State, and local governments are conducted in buildings widely separated. As a result, farmers encounter difficulty in contacting the appropriate agencies with which agricultural problems may be discussed. This problem would be alleviated by enactment of this bill. Its outstanding feature would be the centralization of the various Federal, State, and local agricultural activities in one building.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed at this point in the RECORD, and that the bill be permitted to lie on the table for a period of 1 week in order that other Senators, who may wish to join as cosponsors of this measure, will have the opportunity to do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will lie on the desk, as requested by the Senator from Arkansas, and will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 282) to authorize the Administrator of General Services to assist in planning and financing the construction of county agricultural buildings, introduced by Mr. FULBRIGHT (for himself and Mr. HUMPHREY), was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

(The bill (S. 282) will appear hereafter in the RECORD.)

ADDITION OF CERTAIN LANDS TO BOISE AND PAYETTE NATIONAL FORESTS, IDAHO

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to extend the Boise and Payette National Forests to include 4,155 acres of additional land on the west shore of the Cascade Reservoir, in Valley County, Idaho. These lands are now under the jurisdiction of the Bureau of Reclamation, of the Department of the Interior.

The purpose of the bill is to clear the way for development of the land as a recreational area; $75,000 is scheduled to be expended for this purpose within a 2- or 3-year period, as part of Operation Outdoors.

No extra funds or administrative expenses will be involved, as these improvements will come from money already budgeted.

The district is well adapted for such activities as camping, picnicking, boating, and fishing. The city of Cascade, Idaho, maintains the only picnic area on the reservoir; and the shoreline area is being used without adequate provision for sanitation, cleanup, or fire prevention.

I hope this measure will receive prompt action.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 287) to add certain lands located in Idaho to the Boise and Payette National Forests, introduced by Mr. CHURCH, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

AMENDMENT OF ARTICLE 46, UNIFORM CODE OF MILITARY JUSTICE

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, recently there occurred in California an incident where a civilian attorney was seized by a Marine provost guard, armed with a warrant of attachment, and brought forcibly before a military court of inquiry. The details of this incident and the merits or demerits involved therein are not important for the purpose of my remarks. The incident demonstrated, however, the danger which lies in the use by the military of a warrant of attachment or arrest against a civilian.

A writ of bodily attachment is subject to gross abuse in the hands of inexperienced persons who possess power but do not always possess the discretion born of training and experience which is essential to the proper execution of the warrant. Such a procedure should be avoided where there is other adequate machinery for the accomplishment of the identical purpose. With reference to this procedure, other machinery does exist in the U.S. marshal's office.

I therefore introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to amend the military justice procedure so that any warrant of attachment or arrest by the military for a civilian, issued in the United States or its Territories, Commonwealths, and possessions, would be served by the U.S. marshal for the judicial district in which the person sought resided.

The bill has the endorsement of, and was proposed by, the American Bar Association.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 288) to amend article 46 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice to require the execution of certain warrants of attachment or arrest by U.S. marshals, introduced by Mr. THURMOND, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Armed Services.

WILSON'S CREEK BATTLEFIELD NATIONAL PARK, MO.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, for a long time patriotic and civil organizations have been interested in commemorating and recognizing the most severe battle fought west of the Mississippi during the Civil War—the battle of Wilson's Creek. I join with the citizens of my State and of the entire Middle West, to whom our history and our heritage is an inspiration, in an effort to commemorate the decisive battle near Springfield, Mo. Therefore, on behalf of myself and the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. SYMINGTON], I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to establish a national park on the site of that battlefield. It is my hope that Congress will consider the bill as quickly as possible, so that this historic site can be preserved for future generations as a part of our National Park Service.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 290) to provide for the establishment of the Wilson's Creek Battlefield National Park, in the State of Missouri, introduced by Mr. HENNINGS, for himself and Mr. SYMINGTON, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

SAFETY STANDARDS FOR SEAT BELTS SHIPPED IN INTERSTATE COMMERCE

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to provide that seat belts sold or shipped in interstate commerce for use in motor vehicles shall meet certain safety standards.

Mr. President, the Society of Automotive Engineers, Inc., has published a set of SAE standards for motor vehicle seat belt assemblies, following the report of the motor vehicle seat belt committee of that organization. In other words, there are definite standards agreed upon by the most competent engineers in the country, and it would seem imperative that these standards be met by all manufacturers and assemblers.

I introduce this proposed legislation in the hope that action may be speeded upon this important safety bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 291) to provide that seat belts sold or shipped in interstate commerce for use in motor vehicles shall meet certain safety standards, introduced by Mr. HUMPHREY, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

IMPROVEMENT OF MARKETING FACILITIES FOR HANDLING PERISHABLE AGRICULTURAL COMMODITIES

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a marketing facilities improvement bill, to encourage the improvement and development of marketing facilities for handling perishable agricultural commodities.

This proposed legislation, with some minor improvements, is the same as the bill I have introduced in the last two previous sessions of Congress. This proposal is the result of long and careful study by marketing specialists in the Department of Agriculture, and the devoted attention and work of Chairman HAROLD COOLEY of the House Committee on Agriculture.

The need for such modernized marketing facilities has increased, rather than decreased, in the years since it was first suggested.

It is the purpose of the proposed act to facilitate, encourage, and assist municipalities and political subdivisions of States, public agencies and instrumentalities of one or more States or municipalities, public corporations and boards, and private enterprise, in the creation and development of modern and efficient public wholesale markets for the handling of perishable agricultural commodities in areas where such markets are found to be needed, and where Federal assistance is requested and authorized as prescribed in this act.

Our aim is that unnecessary costs and burdens attendant with the marketing of perishable agricultural commodities due to inadequate or obsolete facilities may be eliminated, and that the spread between the amount paid by consumers may be reduced. We hope that purpose can be achieved through use of insured mortgages under a revolving fund created by this act.

Marketing of perishable agricultural commodities—fresh fruits and vegetables, poultry, eggs, meats, seafood, and dairy products—affects the public welfare, and is quite properly a matter of grave national concern.

This proposed legislation is important to producers. The prices paid to producers of all perishable farm commodities are directly affected by the prices made on these public markets. The handling of such commodities in antiquated facilities results in many uneconomic practices which greatly increase marketing costs, through excessive waste, spoilage, and deterioration. These increased marketing costs cause producers to receive prices far below the reasonable value of their products.

This proposed legislation is also important to consumers. The same undue losses that decrease the price paid to the producer increase the price charged to the consumer. Public health becomes a matter of concern, too, as proper sanitation practices are difficult to achieve in obsolescent facilities.

Small businessmen, too, would be interested in the passage of such legislation. Most of the wholesale firms concerned, and many of the retailers they supply, certainly fall within the category of small businessmen.

And it is important to the city planners who are concerned with redeveloping the blighted urban areas of many great cities. Most wholesale produce markets are located in these blighted areas. In many cities where urban redevelopment projects are under way, the old markets are simply thrown out, with no provision made for new modernized accommodations. In Philadelphia, for instance, the market has been thrown out of the old Dock Street area. The same problem is being faced in St. Louis; in lower Manhattan; in New Haven, Conn.; in Springfield, Mass.; and, as many Senators know, in Washington, D.C.

In spite of the great need for improved facilities, efforts in the past have failed to bring about a satisfactory solution to the problem. This failure has been due largely to the inability of farmers, dealers, brokers, commission merchants and others, individually or collectively, to obtain through regular financial channels the relatively large amounts of capital necessary for the construction of modern market facilities.

As a result, my bill proposes conferring upon the Secretary of Agriculture power to aid in the establishment of such public marketing facilities for the wholesale handling of fresh fruits and vegetables, poultry, eggs, dairy products, and other perishable agricultural commodities, and seafood, as will be conducive to orderly and efficient distribution, increased consumption, and a reduction in the spread between prices paid by consumers and those received by producers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 292) to encourage the improvement and development of marketing facilities for handling perishable agricultural commodities, introduced by Mr. HUMPHREY, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

AMENDMENT OF TITLE 18, UNITED STATES CODE, RELATIVE TO ENFORCEMENT OF STATE STATUTES

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I am introducing a bill cosponsored by my colleague, the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. COTTON], and the Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING], which if enacted into law would authorize the enforcement of State statutes prescribing criminal penalties for subversive activities. My colleagues will recall that this is the same bill which was designated S. 654 in the 85th Congress, and which was reported favorably from the Judiciary Committee. I believe the bill is of such consequence that it should receive timely and favorable consideration by the Senate. As you may recall, though the bill is quite brief in content, it is designed to restore to the respective States the right to have and enforce concurrently with the Federal Government laws in the field of sedition and subversion. Until the Steve Nelson case was handed down by the Supreme Court in 1956, it was assumed that this power rested in the States. As a result of the Steve Nelson decision, however, the Court said in effect that the Smith Act of 1940, the Internal Security Act of 1950, and the Communist Control Act of 1954 have given the Federal Government an exclusive field in which to operate and that the States should desist from attempting to punish subversives.

It will be further recalled that the result of the Steve Nelson decision was to strike down State subversion laws in 32 States. This bill has the recommendation of the Department of Justice, many State law-enforcement agencies, and the National Association of Attorneys General.

I am not a lawyer, but it seems to me that the operation of State subversion laws in no way impedes the operation of like Federal laws. I am of the opinion that one would complement the other in attempting to prevent subversive groups from trying to overthrow the Government.

I believe that the majority opinion of the Supreme Court in Commonwealth against Steve Nelson is contrary to the supreme law of the land. Nowhere can there be found in the Constitution a proviso which expressly grants to the Federal Government the right or the power to legislate exclusively in matters of subversion, sedition, or treason. Certain powers in the Constitution are expressly granted to the Federal Government in article 1, section 8. Under these powers the Supreme Court has held that Congress may preempt certain fields by exclusive legislation. Some of the decisions have rested upon the power to regulate commerce, coin money, support armies, and so forth. In those cases the Supreme Court has ruled that State legislation is superseded when it conflicts with the comprehensive regulatory scheme and purpose of a Federal plan.

I request my colleagues in considering the bill to ask themselves whether Congress, by a rule of judicial construction, intended that the respective States should be dependent on the will of the Federal Government for protection of their sovereignty against sedition and subversion. I think it is self-evident that no such construction was contemplated by Congress. In introducing the bill, I wish to make crystal clear what the intention of Congress is in this field. I want the respective States to again work in partnership with the Federal Government for their mutual protection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 294) to amend title 18, U.S. Code, to authorize the enforcement of State statutes prescribing criminal penalties for subversive activities, introduced by Mr. BRIDGES (for himself, Mr. COTTON, and Mr. KEATING), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ENCOURAGEMENT OF OPERATION OF COPPER AND IRON MINES

Mr. McNAMARA. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, two bills which would protect our vital supplies of domestic copper and iron ore, while preserving the livelihoods of thousands of miners and their families.

I am joined in sponsorship of the bills by my colleague, the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. HART].

It is unnecessary for me to comment on the importance which these two metals have for our continued defense. Without an abundant supply of either, our ability to maintain a strong military position would be hopelessly impaired.

It is true that we have, at present, a supply of domestic iron ore in excess of our needs. But any serious loss of production capacity could jeopardize our chances of success in a future period of emergency.

In copper, the situation is much more serious. In recent years, our domestic production has fallen short of our needs.

Companies find it temporarily sound to close what we might call marginal mines. Yet these are the mines which can well represent the difference between victory and defeat in a future emergency.

What is worse, the fine Americans who have chosen mining as their life work never can be quite sure if they will find a check waiting next payday. Thousands of them are unemployed at present. If the present status is maintained, thousands more will soon be unemployed.

I believe that this is a serious threat to our safety and economy. The loss of mines and mine incomes also imperils the many communities of this Nation which are dependent upon mining.

The first bill which I introduce would authorize the Secretary of the Interior to purchase copper ore at a reasonable profit to the producer; provided the mine's continued operation was necessary to the national defense; and, second, that the mine is unable to operate economically at a profit at current market prices.

The second bill would authorize the Secretary of the Interior to pay the operator of an iron mine an amount for each ton of ore produced, which when taken with the amount he would receive from the sale of the ore, would assure the operator a reasonable profit.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bills will be received and appropriately referred.

The bills, introduced by Mr. McNAMARA (for himself and Mr. HART), were received, read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, as follows:

S. 295. A bill to direct the Secretary of the Interior to establish a program to encourage the operation of marginal copper mines necessary to the national defense; and

S. 296. A bill to provide for a program which will contribute to the national defense by encouraging the continuing operation of the iron mines in the United States.

U.S. STUDY COMMISSION ON THE NECHES, TRINITY, BRAZOS, COLORADO, GUADALUPE-SAN ANTONIO, NUECES, AND SAN JACINTO RIVER BASINS

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, in the last session of Congress I introduced proposed legislation to create the U.S. Study Commission on the Neches, Trinity, Brazos, Colorado, Guadalupe-San Antonio, Nueces, and San Jacinto River Basins. I am happy to say that bill became law on August 28, 1958.

This Commission—whose task is of crucial importance to Texas and the Nation—consists of 14 members, appointed by the President. Six of these members are from Federal departments, and seven from the respective river basins embodied within the study area.

The Commission is empowered to prepare plans for the development of Texas land and water resources. Working in cooperation with State agencies, it will conduct studies and surveys of Texas' water potential, and of Texas' water needs. Its ultimate responsibility is to show us the way to bridge the gap between potential and needs.

I considered it of the utmost importance to introduce this proposed legislation last year, and to see it enacted into law, in order that we might get on with the business of drafting a water plan for Texas. I did not consider the bill to be perfect, and in fact in the succeeding months I became aware that there were two areas where the law should be amended.

I am offering those amendments now. One amendment will separate the Guadalupe and San Antonio Basins, so as to provide a Commission member for each of these river basins.

Combining these two basins in one does not accord with the reality of their interests and resources. They become one river only a few miles from San Antonio Bay on the Gulf of Mexico; upstream they are widely separated. So it is logical that there be a representative on the Commission for each of these river basins, who will carry with him on to the Commission an understanding of the peculiar characteristics and possibilities of that river.

The second amendment would provide a member at large to the Commission, appointed by the Governor of Texas, and representing the Texas Board of Water Engineers. In recent years the work of the water board has increased substantially, and in my judgment, it should be afforded direct representation on the Commission. Such a change will also provide even closer liaison between the Commission and responsible State agencies.

Mr. President, the establishment of this Commission has raised great expectations among the people of Texas. We look to it for guidance in the use and control of our water resources—ultimately the most valuable natural resources we possess. It is my hope that these amendments will better enable the Commission to meet that challenge.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 300) to amend the act of August 28, 1958, establishing a study commission for certain river basins, so as to provide for the appointment to such Commission of separate representatives for the Guadalupe and San Antonio River Basins, and of a representative of the Texas Board of Water Engineers, introduced by Mr. JOHNSON of Texas, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Works.

RECREATION AREA IN SHAWNEE NATIONAL FOREST, ILL.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill which would authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to construct a dam and develop a recreation area on Lusk Creek within the Shawnee National Forest in Pope County, Ill.

This is needed to improve the recreational possibilities of some of the national-forest lands in southern Illinois. Construction of the dam and the development of recreational facilities, according to the estimates prepared by the State of Illinois in 1957, would require a dam with a water depth of 80 feet, a pool area of 3,600 acres, would back water up Lusk Creek for a distance of over 10 miles, and provide a water storage capacity of 96,000 acre-feet. The Illinois State water survey shows that there are many areas which would be suitable for a dam construction and related development.

There is need for this type of development to permit more than moderate use of the recreational resources within the Shawnee National Forest. The demand for water areas suitable for recreation is now very heavy in southern Illinois. The United States Forest Service's Lake Glendale and Pounds Hollows Lakes are overcrowded. The weekend traffic around Crab Orchard Lake and Cave-In-Rock State Park is critical. Highway construction now planned will probably increase the use.

This project would improve the economy of southern Illinois in attracting tourists since this proposed lake would provide many beaches, camp sites and fishing, especially bass, due to the many springs feeding the lake with fresh water.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 320) to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to develop a recreation area in connection with the Shawnee National Forest in Pope County, Ill., and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. DIRKSEN, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

AMENDMENT OF BANKRUPTCY ACT, RELATING TO WAGE EARNERS' PLANS

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to amend Chapter XIII: Wage Earners' Plan, of the Bankruptcy Act. The purpose of the bill is to eliminate the monetary limitation on the availability to debtors of chapter XIII of the Bankruptcy Act. The bill also provides flexibility, in commissions to be awarded to trustees in these proceedings.

The Judicial Conference of the United States, upon the recommendation of its Bankruptcy Committee, in March 1958 approved the proposals. The Conference, at its meeting in September 1958, reaffirmed its approval of the proposal, and the bill is being introduced at the suggestion of the Administrative Office of the United States Courts.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 303) to amend Chapter XIII: Wage Earners' Plans, of the Bankruptcy Act, introduced by Mr. DIRKSEN, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REGULATION OF D.C. TRANSIT SYSTEM

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. THURMOND], and the Senator from Texas [Mr. YARBOROUGH], I introduce a bill to insure effective regulation of the D.C. Transit System, Inc., and fair and equal competition between the D.C. Transit System, Inc., and its competitors.

A related bill (H.R. 13767) was introduced in the House of Representatives too late in the 2d session of the 85th Congress for the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to take action before adjournment. That measure was sponsored by the chairman of the House Select Committee on Small Business (Representative Wright Patman), and he has advised that he will reintroduce the proposal in the House today or tomorrow. The purpose of this proposed legislation is to clarify the privileges of D.C. Transit System, Inc., and to restore the rights of small businesses in competitive fields.

I share the growing concern among members of Congress that numerous small businesses in the District of Columbia are being hurt by tax-free competition of the D.C. Transit System, Inc. Unquestionably, the Congress in enacting Public Law 757, 84th Congress, approved July 24, 1956, did not intend to give unlimited use of the preferred status of the corporation, leaving less favored enterprises helpless.

It has been pointed out that the D.C. Transit System, Inc., with large resources from a secure, tax-exempt monopoly in mass transportation, is moving toward a monopoly of charter and sightseeing services in the District and surrounding area and is using its mass transit profits and resources to invade other competitive fields—such as helicopter services, interstate passenger service via limousine, office and apartment buildings, motels, shopping centers, street paving, suburban routes, and buslines to the airports.

In the charter and sightseeing industry, approximately 100 small firms are in danger of being forced out of business by the D.C. Transit System, Inc. It is my belief that it was the intention of Congress in 1956 to provide the best possible transportation for Government workers and residents of the metropolitan area of Washington, and not to set up a tax-protected monster which would devour small-business concerns.

Beginning July 1956, D.C. Transit's competitors have protested vigorously to the District Commissioners and the PUC regarding the inequities in Public Law 757. Relief has not been forthcoming. The PUC has maintained that, although they recognized the competitive disadvantages to D.C. Transit's competitors, they are without authority to prohibit the corporation from engaging in charter, sightseeing, and related services. They contend that only the Congress can offer a remedy.

Moreover, Mr. George E. C. Hayes, Chairman, District of Columbia Public Utilities Commission, has stated that rate regulation would not be wholly effective because the PUC can only regulate fares within the District of Columbia. Most sightseeing tours cut across State lines—into Virginia, Maryland, and other States.

This bill provides a sensible and fair approach to insuring that the mass transit system does not subsidize sideline activities in competition with independent businessmen.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 304) to insure effective regulation of D.C. Transit System, Inc., and its competitors, introduced by Mr. DIRKSEN (for himself and other Senators), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

OATH OF OFFICE OF JUSTICES AND JUDGES OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, the oath prescribed by statute for U.S. justices and judges does not comply with the constitutional requirement for oaths of judicial officers. Article VI of the Constitution provides in part that "the Senators and Representatives before mentioned, and members of the several State legislatures, and all executive and judicial officers, both of the United States and of the several States, shall be bound by oath or affirmation to support this Constitution."

The oath now prescribed by section 453 of title 28 of the U.S. Code is as follows:

> I, ———, do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will administer justice without respect to persons, and do equal right to the poor and to the rich, and that I will faithfully and impartially discharge and perform all the duties incumbent upon me as ——— according to the best of my abilities and understanding, agreeably to the Constitution and laws of the United States. So help me God.

From the reading of this portion of article VI of the Constitution and section 453 of title 28 of the Code, it is obvious that the oath prescribed does not require judicial officers to support the Constitution in compliance with article VI. In the oaths of the other officers named in article VI, my research reveals no such omission.

While this may appear to be a purely technical deviation from constitutional requirements, I do not believe that the Constitution should be trifled with. There is no reason for judicial officers to be immune from a direct oath to support and defend the Constitution.

Mr. President, I therefore send to the desk a bill which would amend section 453 of title 28 of the United States Code to prescribe the following oath for judicial officers of the United States:

> I, ———, do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion; that I will administer justice without respect to persons, and to equal right to the poor and to the rich, and that I will faithfully and impartially discharge and perform all the duties incumbent upon me as ———. So help me God.

I ask that the bill be appropriately referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 307) to prescribe the oath of office of justices and judges of the United States, introduced by Mr. THURMOND, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

STUDY OF DIVERSION OF WATER FROM LAKE MICHIGAN

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, on behalf of my colleague, the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] and myself, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to require a study to be conducted of the effect of increasing the diversion of water from Lake Michigan into the Illinois Waterway for navigation and for other purposes.

The bill is identical with House bill 1, introduced last week in the House of Representatives by the dean of the Illinois delegation, Representative O'BRIEN. It authorizes a 3-year study and test by the State of Illinois and the Metropolitan Sanitary District of Greater Chicago, under the direction of the Secretary of the Army and the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, of the effect of increasing the diversion of water from Lake Michigan into the Illinois Waterway.

The program for study and testing, as carefully set forth in the bill, is to insure a maximum of protection to all interested parties, such as lake shippers, hydroelectric producers, lakeshore property owners, and the interests of the other cities and States of the Great Lakes Basin.

The program for study and test established in the bill provides that the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, in cooperation with the Secretary of the Army, acting through the Chief of Engineers, shall cause a study to be made of the effect on Lake Michigan and on the Illinois Waterway of the increased annual diversion of 1,000 cubic feet of water per second for the 1-year period authorized by this act, and the improvement in navigation conditions and other improvements along the Illinois Waterway which may result from the increased diversion.

The study program to be carried out is to be accomplished on the following basis:

First. The first period of 6 months shall begin on the date of enactment of this act, and shall be used to develop plans for the tests and range of studies of the Illinois Waterway, with no increase in the authorized diversion from Lake Michigan during such period.

Second. The 12-month period immediately following shall be devoted to a stream survey of the Illinois Waterway under existing conditions, with no increase in the authorized diversion from Lake Michigan during such period.

Third. The 12-month period immediately following shall be used to study the conditions in the Illinois Waterway with a total annual average diversion of 2,500 cubic feet of water per second, comprising the already authorized 1,500 cubic feet of water per second and the additional 1,000 cubic feet of water per second authorized in the bill, in addition to all domestic pumpage.

Fourth. The 6-month period immediately following shall be used to prepare the final report and recommendations which the Secretary of the Army is required to make to Congress on or before June 1, 1962.

The bill further provides that the Secretary of the Army shall at all times have direct control and supervision of the amounts of water directly diverted from Lake Michigan, and that the Secretary of the Army shall not allow any water to be directly diverted from Lake Michigan to flow into the Illinois Waterway during times of flood in the Illinois, Des Plaines, Chicago, or Calumet Rivers. These are all proper protections and safeguards for interested parties, including the interests of downstate Illinois.

It should be noted that the bill actually permits only 1 year of additional diversion of water from Lake Michigan, and at a rate not to exceed a diversion of an additional 1,000 cubic feet per second. The studies provided will go a long way toward finding solutions to the common problem facing many of our large metropolitan areas in the treatment and disposal of sewage by our cities.

The Senate Public Works Committee gave careful study to this problem during the 85th Congress, heard many witnesses and received much documentation bearing on the problem. A majority of the committee gave the following views:

> The committee believes it desirable to carry out the 3-year test to determine the effect of increasing the diversion of water from Lake Michigan into the Illinois Waterway. This will afford an opportunity to secure much valuable information on the exact effects of the increased diversion through the Illinois Waterway, and to report to Congress the results of the study which would recommend the most desirable and appropriate means of dealing with the problem of pollution control.
> While the legislation, by its express terms, authorizes the diversion at a total annual average amount of not more than 2,500 cubic feet per second, which is an increase of 1,000 cubic feet per second over that now permitted, for a period of 3 years beginning on the date of enactment of this act, it should be noted that all diversion is under the complete control of the Secretary of the Army. The committee feels that the Secretary of the Army should not permit any additional diversion until the Corps of Engineers, working in cooperation with the Public Health Service of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, have made a study of the sanitary conditions without the diversion of additional water. Upon the completion of the studies without the additional diversion the committee feels that the increased diversion in the amount of 1,000 cubic feet per second should be permitted for a period not to exceed 12 months.
> The Bureau of the Budget stated that they would have no objection to legislation which would limit the period of additional diversion and provide equal sharing of the cost of the study by the sanitary district and the Federal Government. In addition, the committee understands that the Canadian Government has no objection to a 1-year temporary diversion of an additional 1,000 cubic feet per second of water from the Great Lakes system at Chicago.
> In addition to the studies which would be carried out under this legislation the committee is of the opinion that research programs should be undertaken to solve many of our pollution problems. Such research programs should be initiated to solve these pollution problems through the development of processes which will result in a greater degree of treatment than that which is presently possible under methods of treatment of sewage generally utilized. These studies should be carried out by the Public Health Service in cooperation with other pollution control agencies.
> The effects on navigation of a 1,000 cubic foot per second 1-year diversion are small and the division engineer does not consider it to be practicable of evaluation. He also considers that the loss of dependable capacity at the Niagara and St. Lawrence plants as well as the gain in capacity at the Lockport plant on the Illinois Waterway are of such a temporary nature and small magnitude that neither replacement of the loss in capacity elsewhere, in the cases of the losses, nor substitution of the gain in capacity for that which might otherwise be constructed, in the case of the gain, would be justified.
> The committee believes that the health, welfare, and safety of the more than 5 million citizens in the vicinity of Chicago deserve every consideration in this matter, and that a careful study of their problem is justified and accordingly the committee recommends enactment of this legislation. The committee is in accord with the agreements reached to limit the actual increase in diversion to a 12-month period along with associated and related studies.

I hope the Senate will give the bill the careful and favorable consideration that is needed, and that it will be possible for the bill to be brought up on the floor of the Senate before the last evening of the session, and that this time the bill will be passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would like to advise the Senator from Illinois that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] wishes to have consideration given to the committee to which the bill will be referred; and the Chair will not refer the bill for the moment. Therefore, the bill will be received, and will lie on the table.

The bill (S. 308) to require a study to be conducted of the effect of increasing the diversion of water from Lake Michigan into the Illinois Waterway for navigation, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. DOUGLAS (for himself and Mr. DIRKSEN), was received, read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table.

REPEAL OF 22D AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, we Americans have been a free people for so long that we sometimes become unmindful of the most basic glory of our democracy and of our form of government. That glory, of course, lies in the power enjoyed by those who are governed. It is a power rooted in freedom: Freedom of speech, freedom of worship, freedom of thought; and, perhaps most important of all, freedom to choose those who will govern. This freedom of choice or, as some put it, freedom of election, makes the United States and its government somewhat unique, even in this age of enlightened government. For, sad as it is, the fact remains that the number of nations where this freedom is ignored is much larger than the number of nations where it is honored.

I realize, Mr. President, that these ideas are basic to our Nation and that they are ideas which have been stated many times in this Chamber. I mention them only because I am about to express an opinion which goes hand in hand with these basic truths—an idea which I hope will shock all my colleagues.

I suggest that the Congress of the United States has helped chip away at our Nation's freedom—at our democracy. I refer to the 22d amendment to the Constitution of the United States. It is the amendment which limits, as the distinguished occupant of the chair [Mr. HAYDEN] well knows, the number of terms which any President of the United States may serve. I say it is an amendment which was unwise. I say it is an amendment which was undemocratic. I say it is an amendment which, in the final analysis, deprives the people of the United States of their historic right to choose whomever they want to serve as the Nation's most important leader.

I, therefore, introduce, on behalf of myself, the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. PASTORE], and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. HART], for appropriate reference, a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States of America to repeal and set aside the 22d amendment to the Constitution. I ask that it be allowed to lie on the table for a day so that any of my colleagues who so desire may join in sponsorship.

Mr. President, I point out that, when the 22d amendment was approved by Congress, its proponents argued that the amendment was necessary in order to prevent some future President from becoming a dictator. Aside from the obvious fact that this argument ignored the Nation's right of free elections, it was entirely fallacious in another sense. If any future President did harbor dictatorial thoughts, the very first thing he would be forced to do would be to tear up the Constitution—the 22d amendment and all.

Mr. President, it will not be the 22d amendment which will protect this Nation from dictatorship. It will be the traditional and inherent ideals of democracy under which America was conceived and under which it has prospered for more than 150 years.

These ideals are based, almost exclusively, on the right of Americans to freely choose those who will govern them—the right to choose whomever they want as President, as well as other leaders.

There are many practical political arguments against limiting the tenure of the Presidency. I shall not go into them. They have been well publicized, and I feel they are secondary to the argument that the right of the people to choose freely must not be abridged. Suffice it to say that many persons feel that the 22d amendment was approved in haste and was ill considered. It accomplishes nothing. It adds shackles to the Presidency which the Nation can ill afford. It is in full effect at a time when the need for a strong President and the need for the people to be allowed full choice in choosing a President was never more pressing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the joint resolution will lie on the desk, as requested by the Senator from Missouri.

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 11) proposing an amendment to the Constitution to repeal the 22d article of amendment to the Constitution, introduced by Mr. HENNINGS (for himself, Mr. PASTORE, and Mr. HART) was received and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD an article entitled "Repeal of Two-Term Limit Big Issue," written by Pat Munroe, Washington correspondent of the Chicago American, and published in the Chicago American of December 15, 1958.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REPEAL OF TWO-TERM LIMIT BIG ISSUE

(By Pat Munroe)

WASHINGTON, December 15.—Repeal of the 22d (anti-third-term) amendment may be one of the crucial issues of the 86th Congress. Senator-elect TED MOSS, Democrat of Utah, typifies growing feeling when he says "I'm for repealing it."

Party Chairman Paul Butler echoed Moss at a recent press conference. He said: "I personally feel this two-term limitation should be lifted."

And Rhode Island Democratic Senator JOHN PASTORE also has called for the abolishment of the amendment.

Democratic strategists say the Republicans' successful 1947 drive for the two-term limitation was at least partially responsible for the GOP's stunning defeat in November.

Republican tacticians tend to agree, but are less candid about what has turned out to be one of their party's greatest snafus in recent history.

CONSERVATIVE MOVE

Their silence underscores two points. First, that the anti-third-term amendment received its final major impetus from conservatives of both parties and was directed at the memory of Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

Second, Dwight D. Eisenhower, first Republican in the White House since Herbert Hoover, is also the first President to lose under the amendment's influences. (As a lame duck, he can do little to control his party).

The 22d amendment was passed by a Republican Congress in 1947. Two-thirds of the States ratified the proposal by 1951, and it became law.

Since the Constitution was adopted in 1789, there have been 242 resolutions introduced in Congress on the subject of Presidential tenure.

These resolutions ranged from proposals that Presidents be limited to a single 6- or 7-year term, to what was adopted—that no President serve more than two 4-year terms.

TRUMAN OPPOSED

Harry Truman, President when the amendment was passed was exempted from its limitation. Despite this, Truman disapproved of Congress action but he was powerless because of a constitutional check by which proposed amendments pass directly between the States and Congress.

Senator KEFAUVER, then a Representative from Tennessee, led the losing battle against the amendment.

His arguments proved futile and the resolution received an overwhelming House majority of 364 to 11.

On the Senate side, the late Arthur V. Capper, Republican, of Kansas, told the Judiciary Committee: "There is some ground for the assertion that the difference between a good dictator and a bad one is just a matter of time."

His argument did prevail, and the amended version of House Resolution 27 was approved by the Senate 85 to 18.

EXPRESSION OF SENSE OF THE SENATE ON LOANS MADE BY RURAL ELECTRIFICATION ADMINISTRATION

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, last July the Comptroller General handed down a decision on an Iowa REA loan which has created a condition of serious uncertainty and confusion among REA officials who are trying to administer this important law in accordance with the intent of the Congress.

Since this decision was first rendered, a second opinion was handed down in October, reaffirming the earlier position of the Comptroller General.

Efforts have been made by REA officials to reach a clear-cut understanding with the Comptroller General.

The nearest they have been able to come to reaching an agreement was a statement by the Comptroller General in a letter to the Secretary of Agriculture last December 8, in which the Comptroller General said that he would not attempt to enforce decisions of a similar nature in the absence of an expression of congressional intent.

It is the purpose of the resolution I am submitting, in which I have been joined by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], the Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG], is to make clear beyond any question the intentions of the Senate on this crucial subject.

I ask unanimous consent that the resolution may lie on the table so that additional Members of the Senate who have spoken to me about it may add their names to the resolution as cosponsors.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 2 additional minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator may proceed.

Mr. AIKEN. Because of my belief in the importance of our REA program, I have personally looked into this situation. I find that the Comptroller General's decision of last June, and his subsequent opinion of last October, places the entire REA program in serious jeopardy.

What it boils down to is this: The Comptroller General has prescribed a new standard which is impossible for REA administrative officials to interpret. I am advised that if this decision were allowed to stand, every application for an REA loan would have to be sent back for reevaluation.

Moreover, REA analysts would find it extremely difficult to develop the necessary criteria for conforming to the Comptroller General's position.

I shall not go into all of the details at this time, but I ask to have inserted in the RECORD at this point an analysis of the Comptroller General's opinion which was prepared by REA attorneys.

There being no objection, the analysis was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ANALYSIS OF COMPTROLLER GENERAL'S OPINION

BACKGROUND

The Comptroller General, in his decision of July 21, 1958 (the original decision), held invalid a portion of an REA loan to an Iowa cooperative which was used to finance construction of an electric transmission line to furnish power to a member cooperative for resale to a newly constructed plant of Lehigh Sewer Pipe & Tile Co., Lehigh, Iowa. This company had been receiving service from another, non-REA financed supplier at an old plant located on the same tract of land 160 feet from the new plant. Service to the new plant would have required this other power supplier to expend some $100,000 in modifying its existing facilities and constructing new facilities. The member cooperative had been serving a company-owned residence also located on this same tract of land, some 400 feet from the new plant.

The original decision was based on two grounds. One was that the authorization in the Rural Electrification Act to make loans to furnish electric service to persons without central station electric service excluded persons who in actual fact were not receiving service if they were located in an area served by a non-REA financed supplier which was willing to serve them. The second ground was that the company, by reason of receiving service at its old plant, must be regarded as a person receiving service with respect to its new plant.

By letter of August 7, 1958, Acting Secretary Morse requested reconsideration and reversal of the original decision. The Acting Secretary's letter, in essence, pointed out that the clear language of the Rural Electrification Act itself, its legislative history, administrative practice acquiesced in by the Congress since the enactment of the Rural Electrification Act, and previous legal interpretations of the act all combined to demonstrate that the lending authority of the act related not to areas but to persons actually without service, regardless of any alleged availability of service to them from any source. The letter further showed that the Lehigh company at its new plant, having regard to numerous relevant factors, including its separate operation, the character of its load, and the substantial investment required by any supplier to provide service for it, could properly be deemed to be a person without central station service.

THE COMPTROLLER GENERAL'S OPINION OF OCTOBER 15, 1958

On October 15, 1958, the Comptroller General replied to the Acting Secretary's request for reconsideration. He reaffirmed his conclusions that the loan was unauthorized under the Rural Electrification Act and that the Lehigh company with respect to its new plant was a person already receiving central station service.

The Comptroller General's conclusion that the REA loan was unauthorized is supported, however, by a reason that differs from the reason for this conclusion in the original decision. In the earlier decision, the Comptroller General indicated that despite the literal terminology of the Rural Electrification Act, the loan was unauthorized because the legislative history indicated congressional intent to exclude loans for unserved persons if they were located in an area already served by a private power company. In his October 15 opinion, the Comptroller General undertakes to clarify this position by stating:

"While we used the word 'area' in our statement, we had in mind the factual situation involved in the case we were considering, that is, where the unserved person was located, in effect, on, i.e., alongside of, existing powerlines and the owner of the lines was ready, willing, and able to furnish adequate central station service to the unserved person at a reasonable price. * * * We did not intend to imply that a loan could not be made for the purpose of furnishing electric energy to unserved persons located in areas generally served by a power supplier, such unserved persons not being on, i.e., located alongside of or adjacent to the powerlines."

The Comptroller General then discusses the legislative history which is substantially the same material set forth in the Acting Secretary's letter of August 7, with the addition only of certain testimony of Mr. Morris L. Cooke, the first REA Administrator, which is specifically considered below. Emphasis is placed upon certain portions or phrases over others, in an attempt to support the Comptroller General's newly defined position. In the course of this discussion, the new position is restated to indicate that an unserved person may be a beneficiary of an REA loan only if an extension of existing power company lines would be required to bring him service; an unserved person is not unserved under the Rural Electrification Act if he can be served by an existing power company without extending its lines. At another point, it is indicated that the test of whether an unserved person is a person not receiving service within the meaning of the Rural Electrification Act depends upon whether such person is located beyond, or at least not within a reasonable distance (as determined by the Administrator of REA) of, powerlines.

Certain general statements regarding competition from an opinion of the Solicitor are next relied upon in the Comptroller General's October 15 opinion, although previously considered in both the original decision and the Acting Secretary's letter, to suggest that the administrative practice of REA or the administrative interpretation of the act may not be contrary to the Comptroller General's position.

In its consideration of the respect or weight to be given to determinations of the Administrator under the Rural Electrification Act, the October 15 opinion appears to concede that the Administrator's determination in this case may be legally supportable under the strict letter of the Rural Electrification Act, but notes the Comptroller General's feeling that he has a duty, nevertheless, to report the matter to the Congress if he considers the determination to be contrary to the evident spirit and intent of the Congress in enacting that statute as disclosed by the legislative history thereof. After then reviewing certain aspects of the facts of the instant case and summarizing the factors recited in the Acting Secretary's letter in support of the Administrator's determination, the Comptroller General reiterates his view that there appears little basis for that determination.

Finally, the October 15 opinion concludes that a full report will accordingly be made to the Congress in the next Comptroller General audit report on REA, but that in view of the fact that the REA loan funds in question have been expended and the REA borrower must, in any event, repay the amount of the loan, this Department will not be required to take action to recover this amount before it falls due.

ANALYSIS OF THE OCTOBER 15 OPINION

It seems clear, in the first instance, that while it purports to clarify the test of REA loan authority set forth in the original decision, the October 15 opinion in reality creates a new test. As demonstrated in the Acting Secretary's letter, the legislative history of the Rural Electrification Act appears to afford no support and, indeed, seems plainly to reject the Comptroller General's original test which would prohibit loans for unserved persons located in an area claimed to be served by an existing supplier. Accordingly, the Comptroller General's new test leaves behind the unserved area concept and adopts the unserved person criterion of the act. However, he now construes the term "person not receiving central station service" as it appears in the Rural Electrification Act to include some unserved persons but not others. The touchstone of inclusion or exclusion seems to be based upon intricate reasoning: a person who is unserved must nevertheless be deemed a person with service, and therefore not a proper Rural Electrification Act beneficiary, if he is located on an existing powerline. He is on such a line if he is alongside of it; or stated differently, he is on a line if no extension is required to serve him from that line, or, indeed, if he is located within a reasonable distance of it. Moreover, the applicability of this test of being on or within a reasonable distance of an existing powerline seems to depend further on the willingness and ability of the power company to serve the person at reasonable rates.

The main items of legislative history relied upon by the Comptroller General in support of this line of reasoning are, as indicated above, substantially those set forth in the Acting Secretary's letter of August 7. First, there is the colloquy between Senator Norris and Senator McNary. Senator Norris there states, in substance, that even though it might be possible for an existing power company "to extend its lines further," REA financing would not thereby be precluded. From this plain statement, the Comptroller General apparently derives his conclusions that a person without service may be deemed "unserved," and a beneficiary of the Rural Electrification Act, only if an "extension" of existing lines is required to bring him service, and, thus, an unserved person is not "unserved" if the power company can serve him without an "extension." How any person not connected to existing power lines may receive service without an "extension" is a question difficult to answer, and not answered by the Comptroller General. In another colloquy quoted by the Comptroller General in support of this distinction, between Senator Norris and Senator King, Senator Norris repeats the crucial phrases "already receiving," "already supplied," and "already getting their electric current from a central station," and we are completely unable to follow the Comptroller General's reasoning by which he equates "already getting service" with merely being located "alongside" or "within a reasonable distance" of existing lines.

Apparently to further support his position, the Comptroller General also quotes from colloquies between Congressman Mapes and Mr. Morris L. Cooke, the first REA Administrator under the Executive order originally establishing REA. Reference is made by Mr. Cooke to certain REA practices and policies, relating to "availability" of existing service, at a time when the Rural Electrification Act had not been passed, and when REA was operating under a statute and Executive order which merely authorized loans for rural electrification and did not describe intended beneficiaries. To seek support for a particular interpretation of the "unserved persons" provision of the Rural Electrification Act from this statement of preact practices and policies seems highly questionable. Moreover, in the colloquy relating to the specific language of the pending REA bill, Mr. Cooke states as his interpretation that a person is without central station service "who is not receiving electricity from a high line."

The Comptroller General's October 15 opinion places considerable emphasis upon certain quotations from an opinion of the Solicitor (No. 4506, Nov. 24, 1942), in which there are general references to the congressional intention not to finance competition. However, all these general references are made in the light of the specifically expressed test that a loan may not be made where its effect "would be to substitute a competitive REA-financed service to persons already served." That all the general references must be limited to this definition of competition is, furthermore, made abundantly clear from the fact that at the time Opinion Solicitor No. 4506 was issued, as, indeed, at all other times since passage of the Rural Electrification Act, REA, in considering proposed loans, did not take into account availability of service to the unserved. Moreover, Vincent D. Nicholson, the Associate Solicitor who drafted this opinion, later testified in no uncertain terms before congressional committees that the only test of eligibility for the benefits of REA financing under the act was whether the unserved person was in actual fact not receiving service. Finally, a subsequent Solicitor's opinion (No. 5564, June 5, 1953), referred to in the Acting Secretary's letter of August 7, 1958, unequivocally rejected the availability test. The October 15 opinion, it should also be noted, omits any reference to the fact that the uniform legal position of the Solicitor's Office on this matter has been strongly and consistently supported by the Department of Justice in court litigation.

In the Acting Secretary's letter of August 7, it was pointed out that a significant feature of the legislative history of the Rural Electrification Act was the rejection by the Senate of an amendment by Senator King which, among other things, would have added to the "without central-station service" test the additional test "and for whom such service may not be furnished or made available by competing private enterprise." Apparently, the Comptroller General denies the significance of this rejection on the ground that it is not clear that the amendment was rejected because of this additional test rather than other provisions relating to the amount of authorized appropriations. Certainly, in the absence of a statement by the Senate of the reasons for rejection, it cannot be assumed that the imposition of this additional test was not among those reasons. Moreover, according to what seems to us the clear purport of the debate on the meaning of "persons not receiving central-station service" that preceded the introduction of this proposed amendment, it was the expressed intention of the sponsors of the bill, without the amendment, that the test proposed by the amendment was to be inapplicable. If, indeed, proper interpretation of the debate were that of the Comptroller General, there would have been little, if any, need for anyone to introduce an amendment which included an availability test.

While the Comptroller General appears to concede that the words of the Rural Electrification Act do not support his conclusion, he purports to find this support in what he describes as the evident spirit and intent of the Congress in enacting the act as disclosed by its legislative history. We have already indicated our views that the legislative history directly fortifies the literal meaning of the act, and that it cannot reasonably be deemed to support either the initial area test of the Comptroller General's original decision or the newly defined test of his October 15 opinion (supra). Moreover, even were we to assume, what we do not concede, that there is support for the Comptroller General's interpretation in the legislative history, no one could reasonably argue that the legislative history is not, at the very least, ambiguous, and does not include support for the literal reading of the act as well as for the Comptroller General's position. In these circumstances, the only principle of statutory construction that can possibly be applied is the one which will not permit an ambiguous or conflicting legislative history to overcome the plain language of a statute. This rule is clearly stated in United States v. Dickerson (310 U.S. 554, 561), which is quoted on pages 3–4 in the Comptroller General's October 15 opinion, as follows:

"Legislative materials may be without probative value, or contradictory, or ambiguous, it is true, and in such cases will not be permitted to control the customary meaning of words * * *."

Plainly applicable here is the formulation of the rule by the Supreme Court in Gemsco, Inc. v. Walling (324 U.S. 244, 250):

"The argument from the legislative history undertakes, in effect, to contradict the terms of section 8(f) by negative inference drawn from inconclusive events occurring in the course of consideration of the various and widely differing bills which finally, by compromise and adjustment between the two Houses of Congress, emerged from the conference on the act. The plain words and meaning of a statute cannot be overcome by a legislative history which, through strained processes of deduction from events of wholly ambiguous significance, may furnish dubious bases for inference in every direction."

While, in our opinion, therefore, the newly defined test of the Comptroller General can find no support in the statute, nor in its legislative history, nor in any principles of statutory construction, a closer examination of this test may be enlightening. Under the test, an unserved person cannot be a Rural Electrification Act beneficiary if he is located on, alongside of, or within a reasonable distance of an existing powerline, or if he can be served by the powerline without any extension. The practical difficulties of attempting to administer the REA program in accordance with these views are manifest.

Presumably, an addition to an existing powerline or new line is an "extension" only if it extends beyond a "reasonable distance" from the existing line. What are the criteria for determining a "reasonable distance"? Are these criteria to be related to the general population density of a particular area? Is a "reasonable distance" much greater in Wyoming that it is in New Jersey? Does a "reasonable distance" have any correlation to the type or magnitude of the electric load involved? Does it have any correlation to the voltage or other electrical characteristics of the line to which the additional or new line is to be connected? Is the question of "reasonable distance" to be determined differently where the proposed new line involves a transformation and where no transformation is involved? Would the capacity of the substation involved in the furnishing of service through the proposed new line have any bearing? Would the number of new consumers or the aggregate kilowatt demand to be served through the proposed new line be relevant? In cases where the power company would require additional generation or other power sources to provide for the new loads would they be taken into account in determining "reasonable distance"? Does the extent of reconstruction of the existing lines off which the proposed new line is to be built affect the question of "reasonable distance"? Is "reasonable distance" affected by the fact that the lines of the REA-financed cooperative are also close to the proposed consumer, or that the cooperative's lines in the locality may have been in existence before those of the power company?

It seems clear from the very facts of the case to which the Comptroller General was addressing himself in his opinion that none of the foregoing factors were taken into account. In this case, the Comptroller General apparently felt that the unserved new plant of the Lehigh company, even without regard to the fact that the company was served at its old plant, was not an "unserved person" within the meaning of the act because it was located within a "reasonable distance" of the existing power company line, despite the fact that in order to serve it an addition of at least 140 feet had to be built off the existing line, the existing line had to be drastically reconstructed, and very substantial expenditures in new electric facilities were needed. It requires only superficial analysis to conclude that the test of "reasonable distance" can hardly be valid in terms of the realities of the electric industry.

Similar administrative difficulties inhere in the further requirements of the Comptroller General's test that the existing power company be ready, willing, and able to furnish the proposed service at a reasonable rate. Must willingness and ability of the power company relate to the immediate, or to some future date? Who is to be judge of willingness and ability? If the Administrator, on the basis of what types of evidence must he judge? Much of the information required would be obtainable only from the power companies themselves. If such information is to be obtained and relied on by REA, the further question arises whether in order to reach a fair conclusion the special safeguards inherent in a quasi-judicial hearing should not be utilized. Cooperative loan applicants might well take the position that they are entitled to cross-examine the sources of the power company data.

The mere ascertainment of a reasonable rate would in itself require the Administrator to embark upon a field which engages public service commissions all over the country in frequently interminable hearings, involving conflicting evidence from hosts of technical experts. Is the Administrator to hear various sides of the question of what constitutes reasonable rates in a given complicated factual context? Is he to determine reasonable rates on the basis of ex parte power company submissions alone? Or is he to permit the loan applicant an opportunity to review and rebut power company data and perhaps cross-examine power company's spokesman? The possible consequences and ramifications of the assumption of this novel REA administrative burden are all too evident.

From the viewpoint of the effects of the Comptroller General's new test upon the REA program itself, we believe that the restrictions imposed by the new test are of the same nature as those imposed by his original area-availability test. If the "reasonable distance" limitation had been introduced at the beginning of the rural electrification program, innumerable delays and difficulties inherent in the administration of a loose and unrealistic test would have resulted. The inability of REA-financed cooperatives to serve desirable heavy or industrial loads because a power company's lines are within a reasonable distance would have extremely detrimental effects on the financial feasibility of cooperatives and their ability to carry out area coverage programs inspired by Congress. The undue rate burdens on other consumers of the cooperative and the impairment of the Government's security interests which would flow from the restrictions of the new test would be substantially the same as those which would result from the Comptroller General's original test, as described in the Acting Secretary's letter of August 7.

Moreover, the "reasonable distance" test would permit power companies to engage in "tacking"; i.e., after an initial new line or addition is constructed to serve an unserved person within a reasonable distance, the test would presumably compute "reasonable distance" to other potential consumers from the end of the new line rather than from the original backbone line. The cumulative effect of applying this test might thus result in power companies being permitted to construct into the very heart of REA borrowers' service areas. Spokesmen for the cooperatives might accordingly assert that this test would encourage the location by power companies of their lines in such a way as to preempt large portions of cooperatives' service areas and make it impossible for the cooperatives to obtain REA financing to serve unserved persons in those areas. At various times in the history of the REA program, lines constructed by power companies with such an objective have been described as "spite lines."

While the Comptroller General's October 15 opinion is not clear on this matter, it is also possible that application of his new test may have a serious impact on REA generation and transmission loans. In the typical case, a generation and transmission loan is made in order to furnish a new, cooperatively owned source of power to distribution cooperatives previously financed by REA to serve persons not receiving central station service. REA-financed transmission lines and substations are thereby substituted for similar existing facilities of the power company. Such loans are made on the basis, in general, that the unserved persons who are proper act beneficiaries qualify for the benefits of successive REA loans, whether these loans are for the purpose of "heavying up" the original distribution system or of furnishing additional or substitute generating and transmission facilities. There is language in the Comptroller General's opinion which seems to be applicable to, and would preclude, generation and transmission loans in these circumstances. For example, in the first paragraph on page 2 of his opinion it is stated, pursuant to the Comptroller General's original reading of the legislative history, that loans for the paralleling of existing systems or creating competition are excluded since loan funds may not be used for construction of transmission lines and substations to furnish power to an area already served by private power companies when such companies are willing to provide adequate central station service to persons within the area who are not tied to the power lines.

The Comptroller General's treatment of the Kansas City case, on page 17 of his opinion, lends weight to our conclusion that generation and transmission loans may be intended to fall within the restrictions set up by him. That case involved an unsuccessful challenge to the legality of REA generation and transmission loans to five federated cooperatives, during the course of which the district court rejected the area availability test, the test set forth in the Comptroller General's original decision. In his October 15 opinion, the Comptroller General states that the facts of the Kansas City case differ from those of the instant case, but thereafter adds that the views expressed in his original decision were not intended to apply to REA loans made for the purpose of "heavying up" facilities previously constructed with REA loan fund. The Comptroller General makes no such disclaimer as to generation and transmission loans. This appears particularly significant in view of the fact that the district court in the Kansas City case alluded to such successive "heavying up" or improvement loans, as well as to generation and transmission loans. In these circumstances, the Comptroller General appears not to have excluded generation and transmission loans from the effects of his restrictive reading of the legislative history. In any event, a cloud appears to have been created whose shadow threatens the basic tenets of REA generation and transmission programs.

The treatment by the Comptroller General, in his October 15 opinion, of the question whether the Lehigh Co. at its new plant was an unserved person, in light of the power company's existing service to the old plant, is somewhat puzzling. Certain facets of the facts are first considered and reviewed in support of his initial position. The many additional and substantial facts summarized in tht Acting Secretary's letter in support of the REA Administrator's determination are then repeated. Thereafter, without controverting or questioning these additional, relevant facts, and upon the basis of what appears to be merely a disagreement on a conclusion of fact, the Comptroller General finds there is little basis for the Administrator's determination, and that it is therefore invalid. This substitution of the Comptroller General's administrative judgment for that of the REA Administrator seems strange in view of the fact that earlier in his opinion of the Comptroller General seems to concede that the primary responsibility for determining whether a proposed loan is for an authorized purpose under the Rural Electrification Act is lodged in the Administrator, and that the exercise of this responsibility is not to be disturbed except in cases of abuse of discretion by the Administrator. There is no allegation or intimation that the Administrator's determination in this case constitutes an abuse of discretion. Indeed, in concluding that Lehigh's new plant was served because Lehigh received service at its old plant, the Comptroller General seems to rely only upon the factors of identity of ownership and proximity of location of the two plants. We have already shown how these factors, in themselves, cannot be determinative of the question. The Administrator, on the other hand, in full accordance with the views of an earlier Comptroller General that such determinatins be made only after a thorough consideration of the pertinent facts and circumstances in the case had considered a number of additional facts and circumstances, the pertinency of which remain uncontroverted, and had come to a contrary conclusion. How much full consideration of all, rather than only a few, of the pertinent circumstances can possibly be deemed an abuse of discretion is, indeed, difficult to fathom.

CONCLUSION

After complete consideration of the Comptroller General's opinion of October 15, it seems to us that the full force and validity of all that was said in the Acting Secretary's letter of August 7 remain undiminished. We feel that there has been no citation of any legislative history nor any argument of a legal nature, that carries any persuasive effect or substantial weight in altering this Office's conclusions as reflected in the Acting Secretary's letter. It is moreover, our considered opinion that the modified test as set forth in the Comptroller General's opinion of October 15 is equally lacking in support either in the Rural Electrification Act itself, in the legislative history, or in other relevant data, as was the original test initially set forth in his letter of July 21.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, to cite only one illustration of the difficulties involved, I wish to call to the attention of the Senate the following quotation from this REA analysis:

Under the [Comptroller General's] test, an unserved person cannot be a Rural Electrification Act beneficiary if he is located on, along side of, or within a reasonable distance of an existing power line, or if he can be served by the power line without any extension. The practical difficulties of attempting to administer the REA program in accordance with these views are manifest.

Presumably, an addition to an existing power line or new line is an extension only if it extends beyond a reasonable distance from the existing line. What are the criteria for determining a reasonable distance? Are these criteria to be related to the general population density of a particular area? Is a reasonable distance much greater in Wyoming than it is in New Jersey? Does a reasonable distance have any correlation to the type or magnitude of the electric load involved?

These are but a few of the questions raised by the Comptroller General's interpretation of the law.

Every Senator who believes in the rural electrification program will find this analysis helpful in seeing both the legislative history of this important REA law and in realizing the very real difficulties which have been created by the position taken by the Comptroller General.

The resolution which I am submitting today will make it clear beyond any question that it is the intention of the Senate that REA loans continue to be granted on the same basis that they have been granted since the original law was enacted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be received and appropriately referred.

The resolution (S. Res. 21), submitted by Mr. AIKEN (for himself, Mr. KUCHEL, Mr. HUMPHREY, Mr. SPARKMAN, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota, Mr. COOPER, Mr. MANSFIELD, and Mr. HILL), was received and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry as follows:

Whereas the Comptroller General of the United States in decisions (B–134138) dated July 21, 1958, and October 15, 1958, in questioning the validity of a portion of a loan made by the Rural Electrification Administration to the Central Iowa Power Cooperative, Cedar Rapids, Iowa, interpreted the Rural Electrification Act, in the first decision, as not authorizing loans for service to persons who are actually without central-station service if they are located in an area generally served by a power supplier; and, in the second decision, as not authorizing loans to serve persons, in fact without service, if they are located "on", "along side of", or "within a reasonable distance" of a line of a power supplier; and

Whereas the Acting Secretary of Agriculture, in a letter dated August 7, 1958, to the Comptroller General, requested reconsideration of the first decision because it was inconsistent with the express provisions of the Rural Electrification Act, its legislative history, congressional understanding, uniform administrative practice, and legal interpretations and opinions during the 22 years following enactment of the Rural Electrification Act and, by letter dated October 29, 1958, informed the Comptroller General that these objections were equally applicable to the interpretation of the Rural Electrification Act expressed in the second decision and could therefore not be agreed to; and

Whereas the interpretation of the Rural Electrification Act proposed by the Comptroller General in either of his decisions, if it had been applied to the rural electrification program from its inception, would have prevented that program's great contributions to agriculture and the rural areas of the Nation and to the national economy generally and, if now applied, would drastically curtail the future great potential of the rural electrification program: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the Rural Electrification Act of 1936, as amended, continue to be interpreted to authorize the making of loans for the construction of facilities to bring electric service to persons who are in fact not receiving central-station service, and to continue to serve those who are presently being served, in accordance with the Acting Secretary of Agriculture's letters of August 7, 1958, and October 29, 1958, to the Comptroller General, and that the proposed limitation on the authority of the Rural Electrification Administration introduced in the Comptroller General's decisions of July 21, 1958, and October 15, 1958, be rejected as contrary to the clear intent of the Congress.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I am very much pleased to join with the distinguished Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN] in sponsoring his REA resolution designed to reverse the July 21, 1958, ruling of the Comptroller General relating to REA loans. The Senator has always been one of REA's greatest supporters, and certainly this resolution is a splendid example of that support.

Many of us were shocked last year when the Comptroller General issued this REA ruling. He ruled on a specific loan to a coop in Iowa, but his language was so broad that it would have wrecked the entire REA lending program. One thing is certain, and everyone connected with the program agrees on this—if the Comptroller had made this same ruling 23 years ago there would never have been any REA program.

That is my opinion, and it is also the opinion of the local rural electric cooperatives, the National Rural Electric Cooperative Association, the U.S. Department of Agriculture, and the Rural Electrification Administration. When all of these groups agree on a matter pertaining to REA, Mr. President, you can be sure their position is well taken. As you know, they have not always agreed on policies in the past few years.

This ruling says in effect that a rural electric system cannot serve anyone if a private power company happens to have lines somewhere in the area. The REA Act says loans will be made to serve unserved persons—but the Comptroller General says the act did not really mean persons at all, that it meant unserved areas. This is sheer nonsense. The act is clear and unambiguous and speaks for itself.

For 23 years the REA has administered the act according to what the act said. The Congress has heartily approved of REA's lending policies. That is obvious, because we have appropriated funds year after year to implement those policies.

This resolution merely restates the intent of Congress so far as the rural electrification program is concerned. I trust the Comptroller General will have no difficulty interpreting the meaning of this resolution or its legislative history.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter which I wrote to the Comptroller General on this subject on August 5, 1958.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AUGUST 5, 1958.

Mr. JOSEPH CAMPBELL,
Comptroller General of the United States, General Accounting Office, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CAMPBELL: A constituent of mine, who is the president of the largest REA cooperative in my State and is the representative of the Minnesota cooperatives on the board of directors of the National Rural Electric Cooperative Association, has turned over to me a copy of your ruling, dated July 21, 1958, addressed to the Secretary of Agriculture. In it you ruled that a portion of a loan to an Iowa cooperative was not authorized by the REA enabling statute and that steps should be taken to recover immediately from the cooperative the amount of the loan in question.

My constituent did not furnish me with information with respect to all of the facts involved in the Iowa case, but he had been assured by the Iowa cooperative's lawyers and by other lawyers who have specialized in REA practice that there was no question but that the loan which you ruled to be illegal fully complied in all respects with the requirements of the Rural Electrification Act of 1936.

Since I am not an expert technician in the field, I shall not presume to pass judgment on the facts in this particular case which are strictly technical in nature. However, I do wish to take sharp exception to certain general conclusions of law expressed in your interpretation of the Rural Electrification Act; and to point out certain important omissions from the excerpts of Senate debates quoted in your ruling. If allowed to stand, the ruling obviously will seriously harm and even cripple this great program which has meant so much to the farmers and economy of my State as well as of the rest of the Nation.

In your July 21 ruling, this paragraph appears:

"It is clear from the above-quoted statements that the purpose of the central station service limitation was to exclude loans for the paralleling of existing systems or creating competition with existing facilities by prohibiting the use of loan funds for construction of transmission lines and substations to furnish power to an area already served by private power companies when such companies are willing to provide adequate central station service to persons within the area who are not tied to the powerlines."

The holding of this language, if followed, would make impossible the continuation of the REA program as it has operated in the past in bringing electricity to more than 5 million unserved rural persons who were unable to obtain service elsewhere under terms which they could afford to pay. This is an interpretation of the act which is wholly without any basis in law or fact. Your ruling would impose a crippling restriction on this program which is so essential to our rural welfare—a restriction which your own letter to the Secretary of Agriculture admits is contrary to the express language of the statute. Your letter reads:

"It may be that, literally accepted, the terminology of section 4 (and sec. 2) is sufficiently broad to authorize a loan for the purpose of furnishing central station electric service to a person not receiving such service, even though the service is available to such person and that the effect of the loan will be to create competition with an existing private utility."

You appear to disregard this explicit, unambiguous authorization contained in the statute and to justify so doing by looking at what you call the "evident spirit and purpose" of the enactment. You rule that "the strict letter of the law must yield to its evident spirit when this is necessary to give effect to the intent of the Congress." I must admit that I am surprised to read that you feel Congress did not mean what it said so explicitly and so completely free of ambiguity. It is difficult to conceive of a more dangerous practice than for any authority—whether it be you or an executive agency or the judiciary—to disregard so completely the express language used by Congress and arrive at its own conclusion that Congress intended something different from what it said.

Equally disturbing in your letter are the gaps left in the record of the congressional debate at the time the original REA bill was being considered. These out-of-context quotations might lend some color to the assertion that the sponsors of the bill, chiefly Senator Norris, place the same interpretation on the bill as that quoted above from your opinion. Some of the very language you quote, however, fails to sustain your conclusion. But in quoting only part of a colloquy between Senators, language is jumped over which makes it crystal clear that the Senate intended the language of the statute to mean what it says. That is, the only limitation intended on the use of loan funds is that they may not be used to serve persons already receiving central station service and there is no prohibition against extending service to an unserved person in a rural area just because a power company happens to be serving other people in the same area. If the latter were true, as you contend, virtually no farmer ever would have received service under the REA, since long before REA came into being power companies were furnishing service in almost all areas of the country, but were not extending it to farms under charges the farmer could afford to pay.

Examples of quotations which I cannot understand being deleted from the RECORD are the following statements by Senator Norris, the sponsor of the bill:

"Mr. NORRIS. If I understand the Senator's question correctly, it is supposing some locality be now supplied from a central station, might it be possible for that central station to extend its lines further and would the governmental agency be prohibited from entering that territory? If that is the question, I think not."

"Mr. NORRIS. The fact is that if we provided in this bill that the rural electrification could not go into any territory that could be potentially held to be within the transmission distance of an existing central power station, it would mean that we probably would continue the conditions which have existed in the past. In many instances, if not in most instances, the centrol power stations have picked out the cream in a certain locality and have built lines and supplied it with electricity."

"Mr. KING. If an organization were formed beyond the 10-mile limit to which I have just referred and within which limit the farmers are supplied with electric energy, that organization would not be permitted to come back into the 10-mile area to furnish light to farmers already receiving it?

"Mr. NORRIS. Not to those already receiving it, but it might come into the 10-mile area and supply farmers who were not receiving it. That is a distinction which I think ought to be drawn."

The following quotations which you do set forth in your opinion likewise make it clear that when the Senators were talking about not competing with power companies they meant not serving customers who already were receiving central station service.

"Mr. NORRIS. The Senator says 'come in competition'. They would not come in competition with farms already supplied. They might come in competition with the central power station.

"Mr. KING. That is not my question.

"Mr. NORRIS. There is no intention of going into a farming community which is already supplied with electric current and forming farm organizations there and having them built up to go into competition, as the Senator suggests with farmers who are already getting their electric current from a central station (80 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD 2752, pt. 3).

"Mr. KING. I may say that my understanding of the bill was that its primary and only purpose was to take care of farmers who did not have electrical facilities.

"Mr. RAYBURN. May I say to the gentleman that we are not, in this bill, intending to go out and compete with anybody. By this bill we hope to bring electrification to people who do not now have it."

Another extremely significant fact in the legislative history of this law is that as originally introduced it did by its language authorize service only to rural areas not receiving central station service. Had it been passed in that form there might exist much more of a basis for your opinion. Although it is significant that at the time Senator Norris made the statements quoted above, section 2 of the bill which was under discussion still referred only to areas, and not to persons, not receiving central station service. The Senate committee had amended section 4 by adding the following words in brackets: "loans to furnish electric energy [to persons] in rural areas [who are] not receiving central station service"; but had not suggested that such an amendment be made to section 2. Later, and after the debates quoted by you, section 2 was amended on the floor to conform to section 4.

Sometime after the exchanges had taken place which are quoted in your opinion, Senator Norris explained the language of section 4, as amended by the committee, by saying: "I think that provision answers specifically some of the questions which were propounded earlier in the day by the Senator from Utah [Mr. King]"—the answer in the amended section, referred to by Senator NORRIS, being that an REA borrower could go into an area served by a power company but could not serve persons already being served.

Later in the same debate the Senate refused to adopt an amendment by Senator King which would have had the same effect as your opinion. Had such an amendment passed, you, of course, could be right, but it did not pass, and sections 2 and 4 passed with the "persons" language in it and not the area limitation. This being true, it seems to me your opinion is obviously in error.

It should be pointed out that the Justice Department has in all cases adopted the position which the REA has taken immediately upon passage of the act; also, the Federal courts have upheld the REA position. Moreover, REA has from time to time explained its interpretation to various committees of Congress without challenge.

Since the opinion is in error, and since it will so severely harm the REA program, I respectfully request that it be rescinded by you.

Sincerely yours,

HUBERT H. HUMPHREY.

CHANGE OF NAME OF COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS TO COMMITTEE ON INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH] and the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS], I submit, for appropriate reference, a resolution to change the name of the Committee on Foreign Relations to the Committee on International Relations.

The reason I offer this resolution is that I feel the title Committee on International Relations is more appropriate in terms of the world of today.

The word "foreign" is subject to a negative interpretation of meaning "alien in character." In this day and age when our relations with other countries have such a direct and important effect upon domestic affairs, the present committee title seems to me to be antiquated.

The word "international" is more in tune with the spirit which motivates our country today. By changing the name of this important committee, we would be indicating our awareness of the changing world in which we live and of our desire to deal with other countries not in a parochial or distrustful manner, but rather in a spirit of cooperation and with a determination to help make for a better world for all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be received and appropriately referred.

The resolution (S. Res. 22), submitted by Mr. HUMPHREY (for himself, Mr. RANDOLPH, and Mr. JAVITS), was received and referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration, as follows:

Resolved, That subsection (1)(i) of rule XXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate is amended by striking out "Committee on Foreign Relations" and inserting in lieu thereof "Committee on International Relations". Subsection 6(a) of rule XVI of the Standing Rules of the Senate is amended by striking out "Committee on Foreign Relations" and inserting in lieu thereof "Committee on International Relations".

AGREEMENT WITH MEXICO CONCERNING MOBILE RADIO TRANSMITTING STATIONS

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, for almost 6 years now the United States and Canada have been permitting mobile radio transmitting stations licensed by the government of one country to operate more or less freely in the other's territory. This arrangement was concluded by an exchange of notes signed at Washington on March 9 and 17, 1953, and it permits "ham" operators to operate in either Canada or the United States on a reciprocal basis.

The 1947 radio regulations of the International Telecommunication Union and the 1949 Inter-American Radio Agreement, international agreements to which the United States and Mexico are both parties, are silent with respect to the matter of the operation in one country of any duly licensed mobile radio station of another country. Insofar as the United States is concerned, section 301 of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended, prohibits the operation of any radio station in the United States except pursuant to a license granted under the provisions of that act; in addition, section 310 of the Communications Act prohibits the licensing of any type of radio station to aliens. Therefore, the operation of radio stations in the United States by aliens is not lawful except for specific exceptions permitted by act of Congress or by treaty.

About 3 years ago I was asked by a number of American amateur radio operators, or "hams," to discuss with the State Department and the Federal Communications Commission the possibility of coming to some similar agreement of reciprocity with our neighbor to the south, Mexico.

I did take this matter up with both the Department and the Commission, and after a rather extended exchange of letters and conversation I have frankly become discouraged that any initiative would be shown by the executive department, without an official expression of interest from the Congress.

It is my strong feeling that Mexican and American "hams" should be permitted to operate in each other's country, just as we have more or less mutual privileges for Canadian and American "hams." I believe that it is in the best interests of our country to encourage closer ties with our Mexican neighbors. My modest proposal would be a step in that direction.

Therefore, Mr. President, I submit a resolution which resolves that it is the sense of the Senate that the President enter into negotiations with the Government of Mexico in an effort to establish an agreement permitting reciprocity for American and Mexican "ham" operators.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be received and appropriately referred.

The resolution (S. Res. 23), submitted by Mr. HUMPHREY, was received and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the President of the United States should take such steps as may be necessary to enter into negotiations with the Government of Mexico in an effort to establish an agreement under which certain mobile radio transmitting stations licensed by the United States Government or the Mexican Government could be carried from the territory in which they are licensed into the territory of the other country, without being removed from the vehicles in which such equipment is installed, and without being sealed to prevent transmission.

as additional cosponsors of the bill (S. 193) to amend and extend the laws relating to the renewal of urban communities, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. CLARK (for himself and Mr. KENNEDY) on January 12, 1959.

AMENDMENT OF HOUSING ACT OF 1950 RELATING TO CONSTRUCTION LOANS TO EDUCATIONAL INSTITUTIONS—ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS OF BILL

Under authority of the order of the Senate of January 12, 1959, the names of Senators MORSE, HART, JAVITS, HUMPHREY, CHURCH, JACKSON, NEUBERGER, ENGLE, MURRAY, and Moss were added as additional cosponsors of the bill (S. 194) to amend title IV of the Housing Act of 1950 (college housing) to authorize loans to educational institutions for the construction, rehabilitation, alteration, conversion, and improvement of classroom buildings and other academic facilities, introduced by Mr. CLARK (for himself and Mr. KENNEDY) on January 12, 1959.

FORECLOSURE OF FHA-INSURED MORTGAGES—ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS OF BILL

Under authority of the order of the Senate of January 12, 1959, the names of Senators MORSE, HART, JAVITS, HUMPHREY, NEUBERGER, ENGLE, and MURRAY were added as additional cosponsors of the bill (S. 195) relating to the foreclosure of FHA insured mortgages, introduced by Mr. CLARK (for himself and Mr. KENNEDY) on January 12, 1959.

PROPOSED SENATE COMMITTEE ON VETERANS AFFAIRS—ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS OF RESOLUTION

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I wish to have the RECORD show that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] and the Senator from Washington [Mr. JACKSON] are among the cosponsors of the resolution (S. Res. 19) I submitted Monday to establish a Senate Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

Although their names do not appear on the printed copy of Senate Resolution 19, I am happy to welcome them as cosponsors.

PROPOSED HOUSING LEGISLATION—NOTICE OF HEARINGS

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, as chairman of the Housing Subcommittee of the Committee on Banking and Currency and in behalf of the chairman of that committee, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT], I announce that the Committee on Banking and Currency will begin hearings on housing legislation on the morning of Thursday, January 22. Bills to be considered are S. 57; S. 65, introduced by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART]; S. 193, S. 194, and S. 195, all introduced by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK]; the bill just introduced by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BUSH], and any other housing bills which may be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The hearings will be held in room 301, Senate Office Building. All persons who wish to appear and testify are requested to notify Mr. James B. Cash, Jr., staff director of the Subcommittee on Housing, room 15-A, Senate Office Building, telephone Capitol 4-3121, extension 6348.

Mr. President, as I stated on January 9, when introducing S. 57, enactment of housing legislation is a priority matter for the Senate during this first session of the 86th Congress. The bill which I introduced is, by and large, the same as S. 4035, the omnibus housing bill which passed the Senate last year but which was not enacted into law. Extensive hearings were held on many bills contributing to the development of S. 4035. The printed record of those hearings run 843 pages, and copies of this record are available.

Bills already introduced in this session of Congress express the desire of the administration to supplement the insurance authorization of the Federal Housing Administration, and raise questions concerning the adequacy of other provisions which appeared in S. 4035 and which appear in my bill, S. 57. I am hopeful that the hearings which will begin on January 22 will assist the Senate in resolving questions raised by these new bills, and it is the purpose of the Committee on Banking and Currency to obtain the views of the administration and other interested organizations and persons.

In view of the fact, however, that many of the proposals in pending legislation were fully discussed and illuminated in last year's hearings, I am hopeful that the hearings, beginning on January 22, can be completed by January 28; and that testimony during these hearings will be confined primarily to new proposals and to the more significant provisions of bills before the committee.

ADDRESSES, EDITORIALS, ARTICLES, ETC., PRINTED IN THE RECORD

On request, and by unanimous consent, addresses, editorials, articles, etc., were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Editorial from the Dallas Morning News of December 25, 1958, and "JIM WRIGHT'S Christmas Letter."

By Mr. JACKSON:

Address delivered by him as Chairman of the NATO Scientific and Technical Committee, in presenting the report of the Committee to the conference of NATO Parliamentarians in Paris, on November 17, 1958.

By Mr. CLARK:

Address delivered by Senator RANDOLPH on the subject "Citizenship Role in American Political Life," at the section conference on legislative education, University of Pittsburgh, November 14, 1958.

By Mr. WILEY:

Statement made by the Secretary of State before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on January 14, 1959.

THE TRUE VOICE OF THE SENATE ON THE CLOTURE RULE

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, in this morning's Baltimore Sun there appears an excellent editorial which I commend to the reading of my colleagues.

Thoughtful men will recognize that there have been few instances in which the Senate has recorded its will so decisively as it did after the debate on rule XXII. It is instructive to recapitulate the votes.

The vote on the Anderson motion was 60 to 36.

The vote on the Douglas proposal was 67 to 28.

The vote on the Morton proposal was 58 to 36.

The vote on the adoption of the resolution was 72 to 22.

Mr. President, when the Senate registers such huge majorities, there can be no doubt that the Senate is speaking its true voice, that it is registering its most solemn convictions.

The Baltimore Sun, in its very able editorial of this morning, makes that point. As it says, such majorities are not "synthetic."

I ask unanimous consent that the editorial be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MORE THAN GENERALSHIP

So far as the 86th Congress is concerned, the filibuster question was settled Monday by the favorable vote on the proposal by Senator LYNDON JOHNSON. This provides that a filibuster may be ended by a two-thirds vote of the Senators present. This is a very slight relaxation of the previous rule, which required a two-thirds vote of the total number of Senators whether present or not. Substantially, it backs up the two-thirds principle, whereas the object of the "liberal" drive was to be able to stop a filibuster with a simple majority.

This is being described as a famous tactical victory for Senator JOHNSON, and indeed it was. Both on the floor of the Senate and behind the scenes he managed things brilliantly. The new Senators in particular were given a perhaps slightly chilling lesson in the art of mobilizing votes and keeping them in line.

But it is not enough just to dismiss this as a piece of brilliant parliamentary tactics. It is more than that, as an examination of the succession of crucial votes will show.

The first of these was on Wednesday, when Senator JOHNSON shut off preliminary debate by a demand for adjournment and won by 73–23, or much more than two-thirds.

The second was Friday's vote on the so-called Anderson amendment to provide that the Senate may change its rules at the opening of each session by a simple majority vote. It was defeated by 60–36, or almost two-thirds.

The third was Monday's vote on the Douglas proposal to end filibuster by a simple majority of the Senate's membership. It was defeated by 67–28, more than two-thirds.

The fourth was on the Morton proposal to end a filibuster by a three-fifths vote of Senators present. It was defeated by 58–36, almost two-thirds.

Then finally the fifth was on Senator JOHNSON'S proposal, which was passed by an enormous majority of 72–22, more than two-thirds.

Every crucial vote in the Senate involves behind-the-scenes generalship and careful footwork on the floor. That is the way the Senate works. But neither are Senators helpless pawns. Huge majorities like those comprising the series are not synthetic. They genuinely express the will of the Senate. Give or take a few votes, it is perfectly clear that something very close to two-thirds of the Senate believe that a limited power to filibuster is a good thing—and that when a determined minority feels strongly enough on a given subject then a simple majority is not enough.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I am sorry that for a moment I was engaged in conversation on this side of the aisle. I wish the distinguished Senator from Montana would review the figures he stated a moment ago.

Mr. MANSFIELD. At the request of the Senator from Illinois, I shall state, in view of the fact that some remarks have been made about the votes cast in the Senate in connection with rule XXII, that I think the figures speak for themselves, and indicate that there were no "synthetic" votes, but that the votes registered the feelings of a majority of the Members of this body.

The vote on the Anderson motion was 60 to 36.

The vote on the Douglas proposal was 67 to 28.

The vote on the Morton proposal was 58 to 36.

The vote on the final adoption of the resolution was 72 to 22.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, to amplify the RECORD, let me point out that there were pairs, as I understand.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Yes; as I understand, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES], the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT], and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER] would, if present, have been recorded as voting in favor of the Johnson resolution; and, in that event, the total number of votes in favor of adoption of the resolution would have been 75. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG] would, if present, have been recorded as voting against the Johnson resolution; and, in that event, the total number of votes against the resolution, on the question of final adoption, would have been 23. In short, if the Senators who were absent and paired had been present and voting, the total vote on the question of final adoption of the Johnson resolution would have been 75 yeas to 23 nays—or more than a 3-to-1 majority.

AGREEMENTS FOR COOPERATION IN CIVIL USES OF ATOMIC ENERGY

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, last year I introduced into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD certain agreements for cooperation which had arrived before the Joint Committee pursuant to section 123 of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954.

Other agreements have arrived before the Joint Committee and I now ask permission to have printed in full in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at this point the agreement received before the Joint Committee which arrived on November 5, 1958, between the Government of the Republic of Venezuela and the United States; the agreement received before the Joint Committee which arrived on October 24, 1958, between the Government of Japan and the United States, amending the Agreement for Cooperation with the Government of Japan signed at Washington June 16, 1958; and the agreement received before the Joint Committee which arrived on October 16, 1958, between the Governments of the Republic of Cuba and the United States.

I ask unanimous consent that the agreements be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the agreements were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AGREEMENT FOR COOPERATION BETWEEN THE GOVERNMENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA AND THE GOVERNMENT OF THE REPUBLIC OF VENEZUELA CONCERNING THE CIVIL USES OF ATOMIC ENERGY

Whereas the Government of the United States of America and the Government of the Republic of Venezuela on July 21, 1955, signed an agreement for cooperation concerning civil uses of atomic energy; and

Whereas such agreement provides that it is the hope and expectation of the parties that the initial agreement for cooperation will lead to consideration of further cooperation extending to the design, construction, and operation of power-producing reactors; and

Whereas the Government of the Republic of Venezuela has advised the Government of the United States of America of its desire to pursue a research and development program looking toward the realization of peaceful and humanitarian uses of atomic energy, including the design, construction, and operation of power-producing reactors; and

Whereas the Government of the United States of America desires to cooperate with the Government of the Republic of Venezuela in such a program as hereinafter provided; and

Whereas the parties desire that the agreement for cooperation signed on July 21, 1955, be superseded by this agreement, which includes the new areas of cooperation;

The parties therefore agree as follows:

ARTICLE I

For the purposes of this agreement:

(a) "United States Commission" means the United States Atomic Energy Commission.

(b) "Equipment and devices" and "equipment or device" means any instrument, apparatus, or facility, and includes any facility, except an atomic weapon, capable of making use of or producing special nuclear material, and component parts thereof.

(c) "Person" means any individual, corporation, partnership, firm, association, trust, estate, public or private institution, group, Government agency, or Government corporation, but does not include the parties to this agreement.

(d) "Reactor" means an apparatus, other than an atomic weapon, in which a self-supporting fission chain reaction is maintained by utilizing uranium, plutonium, or thorium, or any combination of uranium, plutonium, or thorium.

(e) "Restricted data" means all data concerning (1) design, manufacture, or utilization of atomic weapons; (2) the production of special nuclear materials; or (3) the use of special nuclear material in the production of energy, but shall not include data declassified or removed from the category of restricted data by the appropriate authority.

(f) "Atomic weapon" means any device utilizing atomic energy, exclusive of the means for transporting or propelling the device (where such means is a separable and devisible part of the device), the principal purpose of which is for use as, or for development of, a weapon, a weapon prototype, or a weapon test device.

(g) "Special nuclear material" means (1) plutonium, uranium enriched in the isotope 233 or in the isotope 235, and any other material which the U.S. Commission determines to be special nuclear material; or (2) any material artificially enriched by any of the foregoing.

(h) "Source material" means (1) uranium, thorium, or any other material which is determined by either party to be source material; or (2) ores containing one or more of the foregoing materials, in such concentration as either party may determine from time to time.

(i) "Parties" means the Government of the United States of America and the Government of the Republic of Venezuela, including the U.S. Commission on behalf of the Government of the United States of America. "Party" means one of the above-defined "parties."

ARTICLE II

A. Restricted data shall not be communicated under this agreement, and no materials or equipment and devices shall be transferred and no services shall be furnished under this agreement if the transfer of any such materials or equipment and devices or the furnishing of any such services involves the communication of restricted data.

B. Subject to the provisions of this agreement, the availability of personnel and material, and the applicable laws, regulations, and license requirements in force in their respective countries, the parties shall assist each other in the achievement of the use of atomic energy for peaceful purposes.

C. This agreement shall not require the exchange of any information which the parties are not permitted to communicate because the information is privately owned or has been received from another government.

ARTICLE III

Subject to the provisions of article II, unclassified information, including information in the specific fields set out below, shall be exchanged between the U.S. Commission and the Government of the Republic of Venezuela with respect to the application of atomic energy to peaceful uses, including research and development relating to such uses and problems of health and safety connected therewith:

(a) The development, design, construction, operation, and use of research, experimental power, demonstration power, and power reactors;

(b) Health and safety problems related to the operation and use of research, experimental power, demonstration power, and power reactors;

(c) The use of radioactive isotopes and radiation in physical and biological research, medical therapy, agriculture, and industry.

ARTICLE IV

The application or use of any information (including design drawings and specifications) and any material, equipment, and devices, exchanged or transferred between the parties under this agreement shall be the responsibility of the party receiving it, and the other party does not warrant the accuracy or completeness of such information and does not warrant the suitability of such information, materials, equipment, and devices for any particular use or application.

ARTICLE V

A. Research materials: Materials of interest in connection with defined research projects related to the peaceful uses of atomic energy as provided by article III and under the limitations set forth in article II including source materials, special nuclear materials, byproduct material, other radioisotopes, and stable isotopes, will be exchanged for research purposes in such quantities and under such terms and conditions as may be agreed when such materials are not available commercially. In no case, however, shall the quantity of special nuclear materials under the jurisdiction of either party, by reason of transfer under this article, be, at any one time, in excess of 100 grams of contained U^{235}, 10 grams of plutonium, and 10 grams of U^{233}.

B. Research facilities: Subject to the provisions of article II, and under such terms and conditions as may be agreed, and to the extent as may be agreed, specialized research facilities and reactor materials testing facilities of the parties shall be made available for mutual use consistent with the limits of space, facilities, and personnel conveniently available, when such facilities are not commercially available.

ARTICLE VI

It is contemplated that, as provided in this article, private individuals and private organizations in either the United States of America or the Republic of Venezuela may deal directly with private individuals and private organizations in the other country. Accordingly, with respect to the subjects of agreed exchange of information as provided in article III, persons under the jurisdiction of either the Government of the United States of America or the Government of the Republic of Venezuela will be permitted to make arrangements to transfer and export materials, including equipment and devices, to and perform services for the other Government and such persons under its jurisdiction as are authorized by the other Government to receive and possess such materials and utilize such services, subject to—

(a) The limitations in article II;

(b) Applicable laws, regulations, and license requirements of the Government of the United States of America and the Government of the Republic of Venezuela.

ARTICLE VII

A. During the period of this agreement, the U.S. Commission will sell or lease, as may be agreed, for use in research reactors and sell, as may be agreed, for use in experimental power, demonstration power, and power reactors, to the Government of the Republic of Venezuela uranium enriched up to a maximum of 20 percent in the isotope U^{235} except as otherwise provided in paragraph C of this article in such quantities as may be agreed, in accordance with the terms, conditions, and delivery schedules set forth in sales or lease contracts for fueling defined research, experimental power, demonstration power, and power reactors which the Government of the Republic of Venezuela, in consultation with the U.S. Commission, decides to construct or authorize private organizations to construct in the Republic of Venezuela and as required in experiments related thereto; provided, however, that the net amount of any uranium sold or leased hereunder during the period of this agreement shall not exceed 800 kilograms of contained U^{235}. This net amount shall be the gross quantity of contained U^{235} in uranium sold or leased to the Government of the Republic of Venezuela during the period of this agreement less the quantity of contained U^{235} in recoverable uranium which has been resold or otherwise returned to the Government of the United States of America during the period of this agreement or transferred to any other nation or international organization with the approval of the Government of the United States of America.

B. Within the limitations contained in paragraph A of this article, the quantity of uranium enriched in the isotope U^{235} transferred by the U.S. Commission under this article and in the custody of the Government of the Republic of Venezuela shall not at any time be in excess of the amount of material necessary for the full loading of each defined reactor project which the Government of the Republic of Venezuela or persons under its jurisdiction decide to construct and fuel with fuel obtained from the United States of America, as provided herein, plus such additional quantity as, in the opinion of the U.S. Commission, is necessary to permit the efficient and continuous operation of such reactor or reactors while replaced fuel elements are radioactively cooling or, subject to the provisions of paragraph E, are being reprocessed in the Republic of Venezuela, or while fuel elements are in transit, it being the intent of the U.S. Commission to make possible the maximum usefulness of the materials so transferred.

C. The U.S. Commission may, upon request and in its discretion, make a portion of the foregoing special nuclear material available as material enriched up to a maximum of 90 percent for use in a material testing reactor, capable of operating with a fuel load not to exceed 6 kilograms of contained U^{235} in uranium.

D. It is understood and agreed that although the Government of the Republic of Venezuela may distribute uranium enriched in the isotope U^{235} to authorize users in the Republic of Venezuela, the Government of the Republic of Venezuela will retain title to any uranium enriched in the isotope U^{235} which is purchased from the U.S. Commission at least until such time as private users in the United States of America are permitted to acquire title in the United States of America to uranium enriched in the isotope U^{235}.

E. It is agreed that when any source or special nuclear material received from the United States of America requires reprocessing such reprocessing shall be performed at the discretion of the U.S. Commission in either U.S. Commission facilities or facilities acceptable to the U.S. Commission, on terms and conditions to be later agreed; and it is understood, except as may be otherwise agreed, that the form and content of any irradiated fuel elements shall not be altered after their removal from the reactor and prior to delivery to the U.S. Commission or the facilities acceptable to the U.S. Commission for reprocessing.

F. With respect to any special nuclear material not owned by the Government of the United States of America produced in reactors fueled with materials obtained from the United States of America, which is in excess of the need of the Republic of Venezuela for such materials in its program for the peaceful uses of atomic energy, the Government of the United States of America shall have and is hereby granted:

(a) a first option to purchase such material at prices then prevailing in the United States of America for special nuclear material produced in reactors which are fueled pursuant to the terms of an agreement for cooperation with the Government of the United States of America, and

(b) the right to approve the transfer of such material to any other nation or international organization in the event the option to purchase is not exercised.

G. Special nuclear material produced in any part of fuel leased hereunder as a result of irradiation processes shall be for the account of the Government of the Republic of Venezuela and after reprocessing, as provided in paragraph E hereof, shall be returned to the Government of the Republic of Venezuela, at which time title to such material shall be transferred to that Government, unless the Government of the United States of America shall exercise the option, which is hereby accorded, to retain, with appropriate credit to the Government of the Republic of Venezuela, any such special nuclear material which is in excess of the needs of the Government of the Republic of Venezuela for such material in its program for the peaceful uses of atomic energy.

H. Some atomic energy materials which the Government of the Republic of Venezuela may request the U.S. Commission to provide in accordance with this agreement are harmful to persons and property unless handled and used carefully. After delivery of such materials to the Government of the Republic of Venezuela, the Government of the Republic of Venezuela shall bear all responsibility, insofar as the Government of the United States of America is concerned, for the safe handling and use of such materials. With respect to any special nuclear materials or fuel elements which the U.S. Commission may, pursuant to this agreement, lease to the Government of the Republic of Venezuela or to any private individual or private organization under its jurisdiction, the Government of the Republic of Venezuela shall indemnify and save harmless the Government of the United States of America against any and all liability (including third party liability) for any cause whatsoever arising out of the production or fabrication, the ownership, the lease, and the possession and use of such special nuclear materials of fuel elements after delivery by the U.S. Commission to the Government of the Republic of Venezuela or to any authorized private individual or private organization under its jurisdiction.

ARTICLE VIII

As may be necessary and as may be mutually agreed in connection with the subjects of agreed exchange of information as provided in article III, and under the limitations set forth in article II, and under such terms and conditions as may be mutually agreed, specific arrangements may be made from time to time between the parties for lease, or sale and purchase, of quantities of materials, other than special nuclear material, greater than those required for research, when such materials are not available commercially.

ARTICLE IX

A. The Government of the United States of America and the Government of the Republic of Venezuela emphasize their common interest in assuring that any material, equipment, or device made available to the Government of the Republic of Venezuela pursuant to this agreement shall be used solely for civil purposes.

B. Except to the extent that the safeguards provided for in this agreement are supplanted, by agreement of the parties as provided in article XI, by safeguards of the International Atomic Energy Agency, the Government of the United States of America, notwithstanding any other provisions of this agreement, shall have the following rights:

1. With the objective of assuring design and operation for civil purposes and permitting effective application of safeguards, to review the design of any (i) reactor, and (ii) other equipment and devices the design of which the U.S. Commission determines to be relevant to the effective application of safeguards, which are to be made available to the Government of the Republic of Venezuela or any persons under its jurisdiction by the Government of the United States of America or any person under its jurisdiction, or which are to use, fabricate, or process any of the following materials so made available: Source material, special nuclear material, moderator material, or other material designated by the U.S. Commission.

2. With respect to any source or special nuclear material made available to the Government of the Republic of Venezuela or any person under its jurisdiction by the Government of the United States of America or any person under its jurisdiction and any source or special nuclear material utilized in, recovered from, or produced as a result of the use of any of the following materials, equipment, or devices so made available: (i) Source material, special nuclear material, moderator material, or other material designated by the U.S. Commission, (ii) reactors, (iii) any other equipment or device designated by the U.S. Commission as an item to be made available on the condition that the provisions of this subparagraph B2 will apply, (a) to require the maintenance and production of operating records and to request and receive reports for the purpose of assisting in insuring accountability for such materials; and (b) to require that any such material in the custody of the Government of the Republic of Venezuela or any person under its jurisdiction be subject to all of the safeguards provided for in this article and the guarantees set forth in article X.

3. To require the deposit in storage facilities designated by the United States Commission of any of the special nuclear material referred to in subparagraph B2 of this article which is not currently utilized for civil purposes in the Republic of Venezuela and which is not purchased or retained pursuant to article VII of this agreement, transferred pursuant to article VII, paragraph F(b) of this agreement, or otherwise disposed of pursuant to an arrangement mutually acceptable to the parties.

4. To designate, after consultation with the Government of the Republic of Venezuela, personnel who, accompanied, if either party so requests, by personnel designated by the Government of the Republic of Venezuela, shall have access in the Republic of Venezuela to all places and data necessary to account for the source and special nuclear materials which are subject to subparagraph B2 of this article to determine whether there is compliance with this agreement and to make such independent measurements as may be deemed necessary.

5. In the event of noncompliance with the provisions of this article or the guaranties set forth in article X and the failure of the Government of the Republic of Venezuela to carry out the provisions of this article within a reasonable time, to suspend or terminate this agreement and require the return of any materials, equipment, and devices referred to in subparagraph B2 of this article.

6. To consult with the Government of the Republic of Venezuela in the matter of health and safety.

C. The Government of the Republic of Venezuela undertakes to facilitate the application of the safeguards provided for in this article.

ARTICLE X

The Government of the Republic of Venezuela guarantees that:

(a) Safeguards provided in article IX shall be maintained.

(b) No material, including equipment and devices, transferred to the Government of the Republic of Venezuela or authorized persons under its jurisdiction pursuant to this agreement, by lease, sale, or otherwise, shall be used for atomic weapons or for research on or development of atomic weapons or for any other military purposes, and that no such material, including equipment and devices, will be transferred to unauthorized persons or beyond the jurisdiction of the Government of the Republic of Venezuela except as the United States Commission may agree to such transfer to another nation or international organization and then only if in the opinion of the United States Commission such transfer falls within the scope of an agreement for cooperation between the United States of America and the other nation or international organization.

ARTICLE XI

The Government of the United States of America and the Government of the Republic of Venezuela affirm their common interest in the International Atomic Energy Agency, and to this end:

(a) The parties will consult with each other, upon the request of either party, to determine in what respects, if any, they desire to modify the provisions of this agreement for cooperation. In particular, the parties will consult with each other to determine in what respects and to what extent they desire to arrange for the administration by the International Atomic Energy Agency of those conditions, controls, and safeguards including those relating to health and safety standards required by the Agency in connection with similar assistance rendered to a cooperating nation under the aegis of the Agency.

(b) In the event the parties do not reach a mutually satisfactory agreement following the consultation provided in subparagraph (a) of this article, either party may by notification terminate this agreement. In the event this agreement is so terminated, the Government of the Republic of Venezuela shall return to the United States Commission all source and special nuclear materials received pursuant to this agreement and in its possession or in the possession of persons under its jurisdiction.

ARTICLE XII

A. The agreement for cooperation signed on July 21, 1955, is superseded in its entirety on the day this agreement enters into force.

B. This agreement shall enter into force on the day on which each government shall receive from the other government written notification that it has complied with all statutory and constitutional requirements for the entry into force of such agreement and shall remain in force for a period of 10 years.

In witness whereof, the parties hereto have caused this agreement to be executed pursuant to duly constituted authority.

Done at Washington, in duplicate, in the English and Spanish languages, this 8th day of October 1958.

U.S. ATOMIC ENERGY COMMISSION,
Washington, D.C.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: The Atomic Energy Commission recommends that you approve the enclosed proposed agreement entitled "Agreement for Cooperation Between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of the Republic of Venezuela Concerning the Civil Uses of Atomic Energy," and authorize its execution.

The proposed agreement has been negotiated by the Atomic Energy Commission and the Department of State pursuant to the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended, and is, in the opinion of the Commission, an important and desirable step in advancing the development of the peaceful uses of atomic energy in the Republic of Venezuela in accordance with the policy you have established. The proposed agreement will incorporate and supersede the Agreement for Cooperation Concerning Civil Uses of Atomic Energy which was entered into on July 21, 1955, between the two Governments. The new agreement, which will extend for a period of ten (10) years, will broaden the scope of cooperation between the Republic of Venezuela and the United States in fields related to the peaceful utilization of atomic energy by providing for cooperation on matters relating to the development, design, construction, operation and use of experimental power, demonstration power and power reactors, as well as research reactors. It is expected that the parties will exchange information in other unclassified areas including health and safety problems related to the operation and use of such reactors, and the use of radioactive isotopes and radiation in physical and biological research, medical therapy, agriculture and industry.

The Republic of Venezuela, if it desires to do so, may engage U.S. companies to construct research, experimental power, demonstration power and power reactors, and private industry in the United States will be able, under the agreement, to render other assistance to the Republic of Venezuela. The agreement contains all of the guaranties prescribed by the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended. No restricted data would be communicated under the agreement.

The agreement will permit the Commission to sell or lease, as may be agreed, for fueling defined research reactors and sell, as may be agreed, for fueling defined experimental power, demonstration power and power reactors, to the Government of the Republic of Venezuela, uranium enriched up to a maximum of 20 percent in the isotope U^{235}, except as noted below, in such quantities as may be agreed, for fueling such defined reactors in the Republic of Venezuela; provided, however, that the net amount of any uranium sold or leased during the period of the agreement does not exceed 800 kilograms of contained U^{235}. The Commission at its discretion, may make a portion of the foregoing 800 kilograms available as material enriched up to 90 percent for use in a materials testing reactor capable of operating with a fuel load not to exceed 6 kilograms of contained U^{235} in uranium.

The Government of the Republic of Venezuela plans to utilize the U^{235} to be transferred for fueling a research reactor now under construction near Caracas, a materials testing reactor to be constructed after completion of the research reactor and three power reactors.

The quantity of uranium enriched in the isotope U^{235} transferred to the Government of the Republic of Venezuela for use as fuel in reactors will not at any time be in excess of the amount of material necessary for the full loading of each defined reactor plus such additional quantity as, in the opinion of the Commission, is necessary to permit the efficient and continuous operation of the reactor or reactors while replaced fuel elements are radioactively cooling or, subject to Commission approval, are being reprocessed in the Republic of Venezuela. When uranium is leased and subject to the specific terms of such lease, the agreement would permit retention, by the Government of the Republic of Venezuela, of the special nuclear materials produced in fuel elements obtained from the United States.

Article V of the agreement would permit the transfer of limited amounts of special nuclear material, including U^{235}, U^{233} and plutonium, for defined research projects related to the peaceful uses of atomic energy.

Article VII of the agreement provides that when any source or special nuclear material received from the United States requires reprocessing, such reprocessing will be performed either in Commission facilities or in facilities acceptable to the Commission. In addition, article IX of the agreement incorporates provisions which are designed to minimize the possibility that material or equipment transferred under the agreement will be diverted to nonpeaceful purposes.

In article XI the parties state their common interest in the International Atomic Energy Agency and agree to consult with each other to determine in what respect and to what extent they desire to arrange for the administration by the International Atomic Energy Agency for those conditions, controls, and safeguards including those relating to health and safety standards required by the Agency in connection with similar assistance rendered to a cooperating nation under the aegis of the Agency.

Following your approval and subject to the authorization requested, the agreement will be formally executed by the appropriate authorities of the Government of the Republic Venezuela and the Government of the United States of America and placed before the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy in compliance with section 123c of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended.

Respectfully,

JOHN A. McCONE, Chairman.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, August 19, 1958.

The Honorable JOHN A. McCONE,
Chairman, Atomic Energy Commission.

DEAR MR. McCONE: Under date of August 15, the Atomic Energy Commission recommended that I approve the proposed agreement entitled "Agreement for Cooperation Between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of the Republic of Venezuela Concerning the Civil Uses of Atomic Energy," and authorize its execution.

The proposed agreement, negotiated pursuant to the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended, which in the opinion of the Commission, is an important and desirable step in advancing the development of the peaceful uses of atomic energy in the Republic of Venezuela, has been reviewed. It will incorporate and supersede the Agreement for Cooperation Concerning Civil Uses of Atomic Energy which was entered into on July 21, 1955, between the two Governments. The new agreement, which will extend for a period of 10 years, will broaden the scope of cooperation between the Republic of Venezuela and the United States in fields related to the peaceful utilization of atomic energy by providing for cooperation on matters relating to the development, design, construction, operation, and use of experimental power, demonstration power, and power reactors, as well as research reactors. It is expected that the parties will exchange information in other unclassified areas including health and safety problems related to the operation and use of such reactors, and the use of radioactive isotopes and radiation in physical and biological research, medical therapy, agriculture, and industry.

The Republic of Venezuela, if it desires to do so, may engage United States companies to construct research, experimental power, demonstration power, and power reactors, and private industry in the United States will be able, under the agreement, to render other assistance to the Republic of Venezuela. The agreement contains all of the guaranties prescribed by the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended. No restricted data would be communicated under this agreement.

The agreement will permit the Commission to sell or lease, as may be agreed, for fueling defined research reactors and sell, as may be agreed, for fueling defined experimental power, demonstration power, and power reactors, to the Government of the Republic of Venezuela, uranium enriched up to a maximum of 20 percent in the isotope U^{235}, except as noted below, in such quantities as may be agreed, for fueling such defined reactors in the Republic of Venezuela; provided, however, that the net amount of any uranium sold or leased during the period of the agreement does not exceed 800 kilograms of contained U^{235}. I understand that the Commission, at its discretion, may make a portion of the foregoing 800 kilograms available as material enriched up to 90 percent for use in a materials testing reactor capable of operating with a fuel load not to exceed six kilograms of contained U^{235} in uranium.

The quantity of uranium enriched in the isotope U^{235} transferred to the Government of the Republic of Venezuela for use as fuel in reactors will not at any time be in excess of the amount of material necessary for the full loading of each defined reactor plus such additional quantity as, in the opinion of the the Commission, is necessary to permit the efficient and continuous operation of the reactor or reactors while replaced fuel elements are radioactively cooling or, subject to Commission approval, are being reprocessed in the Republic of Venezuela. When uranium is leased, and subject to the specific terms of such lease, the agreement would permit retention, by the Government of the Republic of Venezuela, of the special nuclear materials produced in fuel elements obtained from the United States.

I note that article V of the agreement would permit the transfer of limited amounts of special nuclear material, including U^{235}, U^{233}, and plutonium, for defined research projects related to the peaceful uses of atomic energy, and that article VII provides that when any source or special nuclear material received from the United States requires reprocessing, such reprocessing will be performed either in Commission facilities or in facilities acceptable to the Commission. In addition, article IX of the agreement incorporates provisions which are designed to minimize the possibility that material or equipment transferred under the agreement will be diverted to nonpeaceful purposes.

In article XI the parties state their common interest in the International Atomic Energy Agency and agree to consult with each other to determine in what respect and to what extent they desire to arrange for the administration by the International Atomic Energy Agency for those conditions, controls and safeguards including those relating to health and safety standards required by the Agency in connection with similar assistance rendered to a cooperating nation under the aegis of the Agency.

Pursuant to the provisions of section 123 of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended, and upon the recommendation of the Atomic Energy Commission, I hereby (1) determine that the performance of the proposed agreement will promote and will not constitute an unreasonable risk to the common defense and security of the United States, and (2) approve the proposed agreement for cooperation between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of the Republic of Venezuela enclosed with your letter, and (3) authorize the execution of the proposed agreement for the Government of the United States of America by appropriate authorities of the United States Atomic Energy Commission and the Department of State.

Sincerely,

DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER.

PROTOCOL AMENDING THE AGREEMENT FOR COOPERATION BETWEEN THE GOVERNMENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA AND THE GOVERNMENT OF JAPAN CONCERNING CIVIL USES OF ATOMIC ENERGY

The Government of the United States of America and the Government of Japan;

Desiring to amend the agreement for cooperation between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of Japan concerning civil uses of atomic energy, signed at Washington on June 16, 1958, hereinafter referred to as the "agreement for cooperation";

Have agreed as follows:

ARTICLE I

Article V, paragraph A, of the agreement for cooperation is amended by deleting the phrase "10 grams of plutonium, and 10 grams of U^{233}" and substituting in lieu thereof the phrase "10 grams of U^{233}, 250 grams of plutonium in the form of fabricated foils and sources, and 10 grams of plutonium in other forms."

ARTICLE II

Article VII, paragraph C, of the agreement for cooperation is amended to read as follows:

"C. The United States Commission may, upon request and in its discretion, make a portion of the foregoing special nuclear material available as material enriched up to 90 percent for use in research and materials testing reactors, each capable of operating with a fuel load not to exceed 8 kilograms of contained U^{235} in uranium."

ARTICLE III

Article VII, paragraph F, of the agreement for cooperation is amended by inserting the phrase "for use for peaceful purposes only" immediately after the phrase "a first option to purchase."

ARTICLE IV

This protocol shall enter into force on the day on which each government shall receive from the other government written notification that it has complied with all statutory and constitutional requirements for the entry into force of such protocol and shall remain in force for the period of the agreement for cooperation.

In witness whereof, the undersigned, duly authorized, have signed this protocol.

Done at Washington, in duplicate, in the English and Japanese languages, both texts being equally authentic, this 9th day of October, 1958.

For the Government of the United States of America:

WALTER S. ROBERTSON,
Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs.

JOHN A. McCONE,
Chairman, United States Atomic Energy Commission.

For the Government of Japan:

KOICHIRO ASAKAI,
Ambassador of Japan.

U.S. ATOMIC ENERGY COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., October 3, 1958.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: The Atomic Energy Commission recommends that you approve the enclosed proposed protocol amending the agreement for cooperation between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of Japan concerning civil uses of atomic energy, signed at Washington on June 16, 1958, and authorize its execution.

Article I of the protocol would increase by 250 grams, in fabricated foils and sources only, the quantity of plutonium which could be transferred under the research materials article of the agreement for cooperation for defined research projects related to the peaceful uses of atomic energy. It is anticipated that this increased quantity of plutonium will be used principally to provide plutonium-beryllium sources for subcritical assemblies which are used for training and research in the field of reactor physics.

Article II of the protocol provides that uranium enriched up to 90 percent in the isotope U–235 which the Commission, in its discretion, may make available to the Government of Japan may be used in research reactors as well as in material testing reactors, and provides for an increase in the maximum core loading of each such reactor from 6 to 8 kilograms of contained U–235.

Article III of the protocol provides that special nuclear material produced in Japan in reactors fueled with materials obtained from the United States, and acquired by the United States under its purchase option, will be used only for peaceful purposes. This provision is consistent with your policy, enunciated on November 18, 1956, that all such materials acquired by the United States would be used only for these purposes.

Subject to your approval, and to the authorization requested, the proposed protocol will be executed by the appropriate authorities of the Government of the United States of America, represented by the Atomic Energy Commission and the Department of State, and the Government of Japan. In compliance with section 123 of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, the protocol will then be placed before the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy.

Respectfully yours,

JOHN A. MCCONE,
Chairman.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, October 7, 1958.

The Honorable JOHN A. MCCONE,
Chairman, Atomic Energy Commission, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Under date of October 3, 1958, you informed me that the Atomic Energy Commission has recommended that I approve the proposed protocol amending the "Agreement for Cooperation Between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of Japan Concerning Civil Uses of Atomic Energy" signed at Washington on June 16, 1958, and authorize its execution.

The recommended protocol has been reviewed. It provides for an increase of 250 grams, in fabricated foils and sources only, in the quantity of plutonium which can be transferred for use in defined research projects related to the peaceful uses of atomic energy. The proposed protocol permits the Commission, in its discretion, to make available uranium enriched up to 90 percent in the isotope U^{235} for use in research reactors as well as in materials testing reactors, and provides for an increase in the maximum core loading of each such reactor from 6 to 8 kilograms of contained U^{235}. Finally, the proposed protocol provides that special nuclear material produced in Japan in reactors fueled with materials obtained from the United States, and acquired by the United States under its option, will be used only for peaceful purposes.

Therefore, pursuant to the provisions of section 123 of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, and upon the recommendation of the Atomic Energy Commission, I hereby (1) determine that the performance of the proposed protocol will promote and will not constitute an unreasonable risk to the common defense and security of the United States; (2) approve the proposed protocol amending the "Agreement for Cooperation Between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of Japan" enclosed with your letter of October 3, 1958; and (3) authorize the execution of the proposed protocol for the Government of the United States by appropriate authorities of the Atomic Energy Commission and the Department of State.

Sincerely,

DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER.

Whereas the Government of the United States of America and the Government of the Republic of Cuba on June 26, 1956, signed an agreement for cooperation concerning civil uses of atomic energy; and

Whereas such agreement provides that it is the hope and expectation of the parties that the initial agreement for cooperation will lead to consideration of further cooperation extending to the design, construction, and operation of power-producing reactors; and

Whereas the Government of the Republic of Cuba has advised the Government of the United States of America of its desire to pursue a research and development program looking toward the realization of peaceful and humanitarian uses of atomic energy including the design, construction, and operation of power-producing reactors; and

Whereas the Government of the United States of America desires to cooperate with the Government of the Republic of Cuba in such a program as hereinafter provided; and

Whereas the parties desire that the agreement for cooperation signed on June 26, 1956, be superseded by this agreement which includes the new areas of cooperation;

The parties therefore agree as follows:

ARTICLE II

A. Restricted data shall not be communicated under this agreement, and no materials or equipment and devices shall be transferred and no services shall be furnished under this agreement if the transfer of any such materials or equipment and devices or the furnishing of any such service involves the communication of restricted data.

B. Subject to the provisions of this agreement, the availability of personnel and material, and the applicable laws, regulations, and license requirements in force in their respective countries, the parties shall assist each other in the achievement of the use of atomic energy for peaceful purposes.

C. This agreement shall not require the exchange of any information which the parties are not permitted to communicate because the information is privately owned or has been received from another government.

ARTICLE III

Subject to the provisions of article II, unclassified information, including information in the specific fields set out below, shall be exchanged between the U.S. Commission and the Cuban Commission with respect to the application of atomic energy to peaceful uses, including research and development relating to such uses and problems of health and safety connected therewith:

(a) The development, design, construction, operation, and use of research, experimental power, demonstration power, and power reactors;

(b) Health and safety problems related to the operation and use of research, experimental power, demonstration power, and power reactors;

ARTICLE V

A. Research materials: Materials of interest in connection with defined research projects related to the peaceful uses of atomic energy as provided by article III and under the limitations set forth in article II, including source materials, special nuclear material, byproduct material, other radioisotopes, and stable isotopes, will be exchanged for research purposes in such quantities and under such terms and conditions as may be agreed when such materials are not available commercially. In no case, however, shall the quantity of special nuclear material under the jurisdiction of either party, by reason of transfer under this article, be, at any one time, in excess of 100 grams of contained U^{235}, 10 grams of plutonium, and 10 grams of U^{233}.

B. Research facilities: Subject to the provisions of article II, and under such terms and conditions as may be agreed, and to the extent as may be agreed, specialized research facilities and reactor materials testing facilities of the parties shall be made available for mutual use consistent with the limits of space, facilities, and personnel conveniently available, when such facilities are not commercially available.

ARTICLE VI

It is contemplated that, as provided in this article, private individuals and private organizations in either the United States of America or the Republic of Cuba may deal directly with private individuals and private organizations in the other country. Accordingly, with respect to the subjects of agreed exchange of information as provided in article III, persons under the jurisdiction of either the Government of the United States of America or the Government of the Republic of Cuba will be permitted to make arrangements to transfer and export materials, including equipment and devices, to, and perform services for, the other Government and such persons under its jurisdiction as are authorized by the other Government to receive and possess such materials and utilize such services, subject to the limitations in article II.

ARTICLE VII

A. The U.S. Commission will sell or lease as may be agreed to the Government of the Republic of Cuba uranium enriched up to a maximum of 20 percent in the isotope U^{235}, except as otherwise provided in paragraph C of this article, in such quantities as may be agreed in accordance with the terms, conditions, and delivery schedules set forth in sales or lease contracts for fueling defined research, experimental power, demonstration power, and power reactors which the Government of the Republic of Cuba, in consultation with the U.S. Commission, decides to construct or authorize private organizations to construct in the Republic of Cuba and as required in experiments related thereto; provided, however, that the net amount of any uranium sold or leased hereunder during the period of this agreement shall not exceed 700 kilograms of contained U^{235}. This net amount shall be the gross quantity of contained U^{235} in uranium sold or leased to the Government of the Republic of Cuba during the period of this agreement less the quantity of contained U^{235} in recoverable uranium which has been resold or otherwise returned to the Government of the United States of America during the period of this agreement or transferred to any other nation or international organization with the approval of the Government of the United States of America. As additional research, experimental power, demonstration power, and power reactors are planned by the Government of the Republic of Cuba, the parties may, by means of an amendment to this agreement, complying with all statutory and constitutional requirements of the parties agree to increase the quantity of uranium enriched up to a maximum of 20 percent in the isotope U^{235} that may be delivered hereunder.

B. Within the limitations contained in paragraph A of this article, the quantity of uranium enriched in the isotope U^{235} transferred by the U.S. Commission under this article and in the custody of the Government of the Republic of Cuba shall not at any time be in excess of the amount of material necessary for the full loading of each defined reactor project which the Government of the Republic of Cuba or persons under its jurisdiction decide to construct and fuel with fuel obtained from the United States of America, as provided herein, plus such additional quantity as, in the opinion of the U.S. Commission, is necessary to permit the efficient and continuous operation of such reactor or reactors while replaced fuel elements are radioactively cooling or, subject to the provisions of paragraph E, are being reprocessed in the Republic of Cuba, or while fuel elements are in transit, it being the intent of the U.S. Commission to make possible the maximum usefulness of the materials so transferred.

C. The U.S. Commission may, upon request and in its discretion, make a portion of the foregoing special nuclear material available as material enriched up to 90 percent in the istope U^{235} for use in research and materials testing reactors each capable of operating with a fuel load not to exceed 8 kilograms of contained U^{235} in uranium.

D. It is understood and agreed that although the Government of the Republic of Cuba may distribute uranium enriched in the isotope U^{235} to authorized users in Cuba, the Government of the Republic of Cuba will retain title to any uranium enriched in the isotope U^{235} which is purchased from the U.S. Commission at least until such time as private users in the United States of America are permitted to acquire title in the United States of America to uranium enriched in the isotope U^{235}.

E. It is agreed that when any source or special nuclear material received from the United States of America requires reprocessing, such reprocessing shall be performed in either U.S. Commission facilities or facilities acceptable to the U.S. Commission, on terms and conditions to be later agreed; and it is understood, except as may be otherwise agreed, that the form and content of any irradiated fuel elements shall not be altered after their removal from the reactor and prior to delivery to the U.S. Commission or the facilities acceptable to the U.S. Commission for reprocessing.

F. With respect to any special nuclear material not owned by the Government of the United States of America produced in reactors fueled with materials obtained from the United States of America, which is in excess of the need of the Republic of Cuba for such material in its program for the peaceful uses of atomic energy the Government of the United States of America shall have and is hereby granted (a) a first option to purchase such material at prices then prevailing in the United States of America for special nuclear material produced in reactors which are fueled pursuant to the terms of an agreement for cooperation with the Government of the United States of America, and (b) the right to approve the transfer of such material to any other nation or international organization in the event the option to purchase is not exercised.

G. Special nuclear material produced in any part of fuel leased hereunder as a result of irradiation processes shall be for the account of the Government of the Republic of Cuba and after reprocessing, as provided in paragraph E hereof, shall be returned to the Government of the Republic of Cuba, at which time title to such material shall be transferred to that Government, unless the Government of the United States of America shall exercise the option, which is hereby accorded, to retain, with appropriate credit to the Government of the Republic of Cuba, any such special nuclear material which is in excess of the needs of the Government of the Republic of Cuba for such material in its program for the peaceful uses of atomic energy.

H. Some atomic energy materials which the Government of the Republic of Cuba may request the United States Commission to provide in accordance with this agreement are harmful to persons and property unless handled and used carefully. After delivery of such materials to the Government of the Republic of Cuba, the Government of the Republic of Cuba shall bear all responsibilities, insofar as the Government of the United States of America is concerned, for the safe handling and use of such materials. With respect to any special nuclear material or fuel elements which the United States Commission may, pursuant to this agreement, lease to the Government of the Republica of Cuba or to any private individual or private organization under its jurisdiction, the Government of the Republic of Cuba shall indemnify and save harmless the Government of the United States of America against any and all liability (including third-party liability) for any cause whatsoever arising out of the production or fabrication, the ownership, the lease, and the possession and use of such special nuclear material or fuel elements after delivery by the United States Commission to the Government of the Republic of Cuba or to any authorized private individual or private organization under its jurisdiction.

ARTICLE VIII

As may be necessary and as may be mutually agreed in connection with the subjects of agreed exchange of information as provided in article III, and under the limitations set forth in article II, and under such terms and conditions as may be mutually agreed, specific arrangements may be made from time to time between the parties for lease, or sale and purchase, of quantities of materials, other than special nuclear material, greater than those required for research, when such materials are not available commercially.

ARTICLE IX

A. The Government of the United States of America and the Government of the Republic of Cuba emphasize their common interest in assuring that any material, equipment, or device made available to the Government of the Republic of Cuba pursuant to this agreement shall be used solely for civil purposes.

B. Except to the extent that the safeguards provided for in this agreement are supplanted, by agreement of the parties as provided in article XI, by safeguards of the International Atomic Energy Agency, the Government of the United States of America, notwithstanding any other provisions of this agreement, shall have the following rights:

1. With the objective of assuring design and operation for civil purposes and permitting effective application of safeguards, to review the design of any (i) reactor and (ii) other equipment and devices the design of which the U.S. Commission determines to be relevant to the effective application of safeguards, which are to be made available to the Government of the Republic of Cuba or any person under its jurisdiction by the Government of the United States of America or any person under its jurisdiction, or which are to use, fabricate, or process any of the following materials so made available: Source material, special nuclear material, moderator material, or other material designated by the U.S. Commission.

2. With respect to any source or special nuclear material made available to the Government of the Republic of Cuba or any person under its jurisdiction by the Government of the United States of America or any person under its jurisdiction, and any source or special nuclear material utilized in, recovered from, or produced as a result of the use of any of the following materials, equipment, or devices so made available: (i) Source material, special nuclear material, moderator material, or other material designated by the United States Commission, (ii) reactors, (iii) any other equipment or device designated by the United States Commission as an item to be made available on the condition that the provisions of this subparagraph B2 will apply, (a) to require the maintenance and production of operating records and to request and receive reports for the purpose of assisting in insuring accountability for such materials; and (b) to require that any such material in the custody of the Government of the Republic of Cuba or any person under its jurisdiction be subject to all of the safeguards provided for in this article and the guaranties set forth in article X.

3. To require the deposit in storage facilities designated by the United States Commission of any of the special nuclear material referred to in subparagraph B2 of this article which is not currently utilized for civil purposes in the Republic of Cuba and which is not purchased or retained pursuant to article VII of this agreement, transferred pursuant to article VII, paragraph F(b) of this agreement, or otherwise disposed of pursuant to an arrangement mutually acceptable to the parties.

4. To designate, after consultation with the Government of the Republic of Cuba, personnel who, accompanied, if either party so requests, by personnel designated by the Government of the Republic of Cuba, shall have access in the Republic of Cuba to all places and data necessary to account for the source and special nuclear materials which are subject to subparagraph B2 of this article to determine whether there is compliance with this agreement and to make such independent measurements as may be deemed necessary.

5. In the event of noncompliance with the provisions of this article or the guaranties set forth in article X and the failure of the Government of the Republic of Cuba to carry out the provisions of this article within a reasonable time, to suspend or terminate this agreement and require the return of any materials, equipment, and devices referred to in subparagraph B2 of this article.

6. To consult with the Government of the Republic of Cuba in the matter of health and safety.

C. The Government of the Republic of Cuba undertakes to facilitate the application of the safeguards provided for in this article.

ARTICLE X

The Government of the Republic of Cuba guarantees that:

(a) Safeguards provided in article IX shall be maintained.

(b) No material, including equipment and devices, transferred to the Government of the Republic of Cuba or authorized persons under its jurisdiction pursuant to this agreement by lease, sale, or otherwise, shall be used for atomic weapons or for research on or development of atomic weapons or for any other military purposes, and that no such material, including equipment and devices, will be transferred to unauthorized persons or beyond the jurisdiction of the Government of the Republic of Cuba except as the U.S. Commission may agree to such transfer to another nation or international organization and then only if in the opinion of the U.S. Commission such transfer falls within the scope of an agreement for cooperation between the United States of America and the other nation or international organization.

ARTICLE XI

The Government of the United States of America and the Government of the Republic of Cuba affirm their common interest in the International Atomic Energy Agency, and to this end:

(a) The parties will consult with each other upon the request of either party, to determine in what respects and to what extent, if any, they desire to arrange for the administration by the International Atomic Energy Agency of those conditions, controls, and safeguards, including those relating to health and safety standards required by the Agency in connection with similar assistance rendered to a cooperating nation under the aegis of the Agency.

(b) In the event the parties do not reach a mutually satisfactory agreement following the consultation provided in subparagraph (a) of this article, either party may by notification terminate this agreement. In the event this agreement is so terminated, the Government of the Republic of Cuba shall return to the U.S. Commission all source and special nuclear materials received pursuant to this agreement and in its possession or in the possession of persons under its jurisdiction.

ARTICLE XII

A. The agreement for cooperation signed on June 26, 1956, is superseded in its entirety on the date this agreement enters into force.

B. This agreement shall enter into force on the date on which each Government shall have received from the other Government written notification that it has complied with all statutory and constitutional requirements for the entry into force of such agreement and shall remain in force for a period of 20 years.

In witness whereof, the undersigned, duly authorized, have signed this agreement.

U.S. ATOMIC ENERGY COMMISSION,
Washington, D.C., August 22, 1958.

THE PRESIDENT,
The White House.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: The Atomic Energy Commission recommends that you approve the enclosed proposed agreement entitled "Agreement for Cooperation Concerning the Civil Uses of Atomic Energy Between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of the Republic of Cuba," and authorize its execution.

The agreement has been negotiated by the Atomic Energy Commission and the Department of State pursuant to the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended, and is, in the opinion of the Commission, an important and desirable step in advancing the development of the peaceful uses of atomic energy in the Republic of Cuba in accordance with the policy you have established. The agreement will incorporate and supersede the Agreement for Cooperation Concerning Civil Uses of Atomic Energy which was entered into on July 19, 1955, between the two Governments. The new agreement, which will extend for a period of 20 years, will broaden the scope of cooperation between the Republic of Cuba and the United States in fields related to the peaceful utilization of atomic energy by providing for cooperation on matters relating to the development, design, construction, operation and use of experimental power, demonstration power and power reactors, as well as research reactors. It is expected that the parties will exchange information in other unclassified areas including health and safety problems related to the operation and use of such reactors; and the use of radioactive isotopes and radiation in physical and biological research, medical therapy, agriculture and industry.

The Republic of Cuba, if it desires to do so, may engage U.S. companies to construct research, experimental power, demonstration power and power reactors, and private industry in the United States will be able, under the agreement, to render other assistance to the Republic of Cuba. The agreement contains all of the guarantees prescribed by the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended. No restricted data would be communicated under the agreement.

The agreement will permit the Commission to sell or lease, as may be agreed, to the Government of the Republic of Cuba uranium enriched up to a maximum of 20 percent in the isotope U^{235}, except as noted below, in such quantities as may be agreed, for fueling defined reactor projects in the Republic of Cuba; provided, however, that the net amount of any uranium sold or leased during the period of the agreement does not exceed 700 kilograms of contained U^{235}. The Commission at its discretion, may make a portion of the foregoing 700 kilograms available as material enriched up to 90 percent for use in research and materials testing reactors each capable of operating with a fuel load not to exceed 8 kilograms of contained U^{235} in uranium. At present it is expected that the U^{235} to be transferred to the Republic of Cuba will be employed in a power reactor. As in the case of sale transactions, in the event of lease, the agreement would permit the retention by the Government of the Republic of Cuba of special nuclear materials produced in fuel elements obtained from the United States.

The quantity of uranium enriched in the isotope U^{235} transferred to the Government of the Republic of Cuba for use as fuel in reactors will not at any time be in excess of the amount of material necessary for the full loading of each defined reactor project plus such additional quantity as, in the opinion of the Commission, is necessary to permit the efficient and continuous operation of the reactor or reactors while replaced fuel elements are radioactively cooling or, subject to Commission approval, are being reprocessed in the Republic of Cuba.

Article V of the agreement would permit the transfer of limited amounts of special nuclear material, including U^{235}, U^{233} and plutonium, for defined research projects related to the peaceful uses of atomic energy.

Article VII of the agreement provides that when any source or special nuclear material requires reprocessing, such reprocessing will be performed either in Commission facilities or in facilities acceptable to the Commission. In addition, article IX of the agreement incorporates provisions which are designed to minimize the possibility that material or equipment transferred under the agreement will be diverted to nonpeaceful purposes.

In article XI the parties affirm their common interest in the International Atomic Energy Agency and agree to consult with each other to determine in what respect and to what extent they desire to arrange for the administration by the International Atomic Energy Agency for those conditions, controls, and safeguards including those relating to health and safety standards required by the Agency in connection with similar assistance rendered to a cooperating nation under the aegis of the Agency.

Following your approval and subject to the authorization requested, the agreement will be formally executed by the appropriate authorities of the Government of the Republic of Cuba and the Government of the United States of America and placed before the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy in compliance with section 123c of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended.

Respectfully,

JOHN A. MCCONE,
Chairman.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, August 25, 1958.

The Honorable JOHN A. MCCONE,
Chairman, Atomic Energy Commission.

DEAR MR. MCCONE: Under date of August 22, 1958, the Atomic Energy Commission recommended that I approve the proposed agreement entitled "Agreement for Cooperation Concerning the Civil Uses of Atomic Energy Between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of the Republic of Cuba," and authorize its execution.

The proposed agreement, negotiated pursuant to the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended, which in the opinion of the Commission, is an important and desirable step in advancing the development of the peaceful uses of atomic energy in the Republic of Cuba, has been reviewed. It will incorporate and supersede the Agreement for Cooperation Concerning Civil Uses of Atomic Energy which was entered into on June 26, 1956, between the two Governments. The new agreement, which will extend for a period of 20 years, will broaden the scope of cooperation between the Republic of Cuba and the United States in fields related to the peaceful utilization of atomic energy by providing for cooperation on matters relating to the development, design, construction, operation, and use of experimental power, demonstration power and power reactors, as well as research reactors. It is expected that the parties will exchange information in other unclassified areas including health and safety problems related to the operation and use of such reactors, and the use of radioactive isotopes and radiation in physical and biological research, medical therapy, agriculture, and industry.

The Republic of Cuba, if it desires to do so, may engage United States companies to construct research, experimental power, demonstration power, and power reactors, and private industry in the United States will be able, under the agreement, to render other assistance to the Republic of Cuba. The agreement contains all of the guarantees prescribed by the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended. No restricted data would be communicated under this agreement.

The agreement will permit the Commission to sell or lease, as may be agreed, to the Government of the Republic of Cuba uranium enriched up to a maximum of 20 percent in the isotope U^{235}, except as noted below, in such quantities as may be agreed, for fueling defined reactor projects in the Republic of Cuba: Provided, however, That the net amount of any uranium sold or leased during the period of the agreement does not exceed 700 kilograms of contained U–235. The Commission, at its discretion, may make a portion of the foregoing 700 kilograms available as material enriched up to 90 percent for use in research and materials testing reactors each capable of operating with a fuel load not to exceed 8 kilograms of contained U^{235} in uranium.

The quantity of uranium enriched in the isotope U^{235} transferred to the Government of the Republic of Cuba for use as fuel in reactors will not at any time be in excess of the amount of material necessary for the full loading of each defined reactor plus such additional quantity as, in the opinion of the Commission, is necessary to permit the efficient and continuous operation of the reactor or reactors while replaced fuel elements are radioactively cooling or, subject to Commission approval, are being reprocessed in the Republic of Cuba. When uranium is leased, and subject to the specific terms of such lease, the agreement would permit retention, by the Government of the Republic of Cuba, of the special nuclear materials produced in fuel elements obtained from the United States.

Article V of the agreement would permit the transfer of limited amounts of special nuclear material, including U^{235}, U^{233}, and plutonium, for defined research projects related to the peaceful uses of atomic energy. Article VII provides that when any source or special nuclear material received from the United States requires reprocessing, such reprocessing will be performed either in Commission facilities or in facilities acceptable to the Commission. In addition, article IX of the agreement incorporates provisions which are designed to minimize the possibility that material or equipment transferred under the agreement will be diverted to nonpeaceful purposes.

In article XI the parties state their common interest in the International Atomic Energy Agency and agree to consult with each other to determine in what respect and to what extent they desire to arrange for the administration by the International Atomic Energy Agency for those conditions, controls and safeguards including those relating to health and safety standards required by the Agency in connection with similar assistance rendered to a cooperating nation under the aegis of the Agency.

Pursuant to the provisions of section 123 of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended, and upon the recommendation of the Atomic Energy Commission, I hereby (1) determine that the performance of the proposed agreement will promote and will not constitute an unreasonable risk to the common defense and security of the United States, and (2) approve the proposed Agreement for Cooperation between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of the Republic of Cuba enclosed with your letter, and (3) authorize the execution of the proposed agreement for the Government of the United States of America by appropriate authorities of the U. S. Atomic Energy Commission and the Department of State.

Sincerely,

DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER.

AMENDMENT OF AGREEMENT WITH REPUBLIC OF CHINA CONCERNING CIVIL USES OF ATOMIC ENERGY

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, an amendment, signed at Washington on December 8, 1958, to the agreement for cooperation between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of the Republic of China concerning civil uses of atomic energy has arrived before the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, pursuant to section 123 of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954.

I now ask permission to have printed in full in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at this point the agreement which arrived at the Joint Committee on December 29, 1958.

There being no objection, the agreement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMENDMENT TO AGREEMENT FOR COOPERATION BETWEEN THE GOVERNMENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA AND THE GOVERNMENT OF THE REPUBLIC OF CHINA CONCERNING CIVIL USES OF ATOMIC ENERGY

The Government of the United States of America and the Government of the Republic of China;

Desiring to amend the agreement for cooperation between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of the Republic of China concerning civil uses of atomic energy, signed at Washington on July 18, 1955, hereinafter referred to as the "agreement for cooperation";

Have agreed as follows:

ARTICLE I

Article I of the agreement for cooperation is amended to read as follows:

"A. Subject to the limitations of article V, the parties hereto will exchange information in the following fields:

"1. Design, construction, and operation of research reactors and their use as research, development, and engineering tools and in medical therapy.

"2. Health and safety problems related to the operation and use of research reactors.

"3. The use of radioactive isotopes in physical and biological research, medical therapy, agriculture, and industry.

"B. The application or use of any information or data of any kind whatsoever, including design drawings and specifications, exchanged under this agreement shall be the responsibility of the party which receives and uses such information or data, and it is understood that the other cooperating party does not warrant the accuracy, completeness or suitability of such information or data for any particular use or application."

ARTICLE II

The following new article is added directly after article III of the agreement for cooperation.

"ARTICLE III (A)

"Materials of interest in connection with defined research projects related to the peaceful uses of atomic energy undertaken by the Government of the Republic of China, including source materials, special nuclear materials, byproducts material, other radioisotopes, and stable isotopes, will be sold or otherwise transferred to the Government of the Republic of China by the Commission for research purposes in such quantities and under such terms and conditions as may be agreed when such materials are not available commercially. In no case, however, shall the quantity of special nuclear materials under the jurisdiction of the Government of the Republic of China by reason of transfer under this article, be, at any one time, in excess of 100 grams of contained U^{235}, 10 grams of U^{233}, 250 grams of plutonium in the form of fabricated foils and sources, and 10 grams of plutonium in other forms."

ARTICLE III

1. Article VI, paragraph A of the agreement for cooperation is amended by deleting the phrase "uranium enriched in the isotope U^{235} leased from the Commission" and substituting in lieu thereof the phrase "special nuclear materials received from the Commission."

2. The following new paragraph is added to article VI of the agreement for cooperation:

"D. Some atomic energy materials which the Government of the Republic of China may request the Commission to provide in accordance with this arrangement are harmful to persons and property unless handled and used carefully. After delivery of such materials to the Government of the Republic of China, the Government of the Republic of China shall bear all responsibility, insofar as the Government of the United States is concerned, for the safe handling and use of such materials. With respect to any special nuclear materials or fuel elements which the Commission may, pursuant to this agreement, lease to the Government of the Republic of China or to any private individual or private organization under its jurisdiction, the Government of the Republic of China shall indemnify and save harmless the Government of the United States against any and all liability (including third party liability) from any cause whatsoever arising out of the production or fabrication, the ownership, the lease, and the possession and use of such special nuclear materials or fuel elements after delivery by the Commission to the Government of the Republic of China or to any authorized private individual or private organization under its jurisdiction."

ARTICLE IV

This amendment shall enter into force on the date on which each Government shall have received from the other Government written notification that it has complied with all statutory and constitutional requirements for the entry into force of such amendment and shall remain in force for the period of the Agreement for Cooperation.

In witness whereof, the undersigned, duly authorized, have signed this amendment.

Done at Washington in duplicate this 8th day of December 1958.

For the Government of the United States of America:

WALTER S. ROBERTSON.
JOHN A. MCCONE.

For the Government of the Republic of China:

GEORGE K. C. YEH.

U.S. ATOMIC ENERGY COMMISSION,
Washington, D.C., November 10, 1958.
THE PRESIDENT,
The White House.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: The Atomic Energy Commission recommends that you approve the enclosed amendment to the Agreement for Cooperation between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of the Republic of China Concerning Civil Uses of Atomic Energy, signed at Washington on July 18, 1955, and authorize its execution. The Department of State supports the Commission's recommendation.

Articles I and III of the amendment include new provisions designed to clarify responsibilities assumed by the parties to the agreement with respect to liability for any causes arising out of the handling or use of information or data, special nuclear material or fuel elements transferred pursuant to the agreement.

Article II of the amendment would permit the transfer of limited amounts of special nuclear materials, namely U^{235}, U^{233} and plutonium, for defined research projects related to the peaceful uses of atomic energy. It will be noted that article II reflects a decision by the Commission to increase by 250 grams, in fabricated foils and sources only, the quantity of plutonium made available under the research materials article of Agreements for Cooperation. This increased quantity of plutonium will be used principally to provide plutonium-beryllium sources for subcritical assemblies which are used for training and reactor physics.

Subject to your approval, and to the authorization requested, the proposed amendment will be executed by the appropriate authorities of the Government of the United States of America, represented by the Atomic Energy Commission and the Department of State, and the Government of the Republic of China. In compliance with section 123 of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, the amendment will then be placed before the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy.

Respectfully yours,
JOHN A. MCCONE,
Chairman.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, November 20, 1958.
The Honorable JOHN A. MCCONE,
Chairman, Atomic Energy Commission,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Under date of November 10, 1958, you informed me that the Atomic Energy Commission recommended that I approve a proposed amendment to the Agreement for Cooperation between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of the Republic of China Concerning Civil Uses of Atomic Energy, signed at Washington on July 18, 1955, and authorize its execution.

Articles I and III of the amendment include new provisions designed to clarify responsibilities assumed by the parties to the agreement with respect to liability for any causes arising out of the handling or use of information or data, special nuclear material or fuel elements transferred pursuant to the agreement.

Article II of the amendment would permit the transfer of limited amounts of special nuclear materials, namely U-235, U-233 and plutonium, for defined research projects related to the peaceful uses of atomic energy.

Pursuant to the provisions of section 123 of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954 and upon the recommendation of the Atomic Energy Commission, I hereby—

(1) Determine that the performance of the proposed amendment to the agreement will promote and will not constitute an unreasonable risk to the common defense and security of the United States; and

(2) Approve the proposed amendment to the agreement for Cooperation Concerning Civil Uses of Atomic Energy between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of the Republic of China enclosed with your letter of November 10, 1958; and

(3) Authorize the execution of the proposed amendment for the Government of the United States by appropriate authorities of the United States Atomic Energy Commission and the Department of State.

Sincerely,
DWIGHT EISENHOWER.

RESPONSIBILITY FOR DELAY IN THE MISSILE PROGRAM

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I asked the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. SYMINGTON] to be present at this time because I wished to make some comments on the missile-program statement he made on Monday.

In connection with that matter, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at this time I may proceed for 4 minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. SYMINGTON] has had a truly impressive record in the cause of our national security. In the Truman administration, he served variously as Assistant Secretary of War for Air, as Secretary of the Air Force, and as Chairman of the National Security Resources Board. Few men have been privileged to have such an impact on our security and survival. When he speaks, I listen.

On Monday, he spoke on this floor. The essence of his statement can be broken down into three or four items: First, that Vice President NIXON's reported statement that we are now ahead of the Soviets in ballistic missiles is not true; second, that unless the Vice President by the weekend told the country what our percentage of intercontinental ballistic missiles is, compared with Intelligence estimates of what the Soviets will have by the end of the year and how many we may have by the end of 1961, percentagewise, compared with the Soviets, the distinguished Senator will release the figures himself; third, that high officials in this administration seem to be lulling the people into a state of unjustified complacency.

Whether the Vice President made such a statement as the Senator has quoted is a matter of doubt. He is rather careful with his statements and figures.

The distinguished Senator from Missouri has an admitted devotion to our security and defense. He had long experience in that field in the Truman administration. His evident concern over any lag in the missile program is sincere and most undoubted. But his statement raised some questions in my mind.

Would the whole cause of national security not be better served if he or an equally responsible spokesman for the Truman administration would confess candidly and unequivocally that while our missile program was virtually nonexistent, the Soviet program was going forward full tilt?

Would the cause of national security not be better served if he or some equally responsible spokesman would either deny or admit or point out the error in the Associated Press interview with Dr. Wernher von Braun, our foremost missile expert, in November of 1957, when he said, in response to a question as to why the Soviets were apparently able to outstrip us in reaching into space, that "the main reason is that the United States had no ballistic missile program worth mentioning between 1945 and 1951."

Would open confession not be good for the soul, for the country, and for our national security, in freely telling the country that these were 6 Truman years.

When Dr. von Braun said in the same interview, "these 6 years during which the Russians obviously laid the groundwork for their large rocket program are irretrievably lost," these years were lost by the Truman administration.

When Dr. von Braun said these 6 years were "irretrievably lost," he could only mean that they were lost beyond all recall.

Will the distinguished Senator from Missouri not agree that achievement in the missile field is the product of time, talent, and treasure; and that no matter how much money is voted, or how much talent is available, the time lost by the Truman administration has been the real handicap, and that the bitter inheritance of the Eisenhower administration was to catch up from behind—far behind because of the Truman administration's failure and neglect?

Is it not true that the Eisenhower administration has been riding herd on this program with whip and spur, and spending billions of dollars to overcome the Truman administration's neglect?

Would it not be enlightening to the Congress and country for the distinguished Senator to explain that a comparison of our defense posture is not a kind of one-for-one proposition, where we compare the number of missiles of each type a nation may have, but that it is rather a question of balance in which the whole deterrent power, including bombers, missiles, vessels, subs, fighters, and other weapons, is compared in the aggregate?

Instead of downgrading our deterrent power or threatening to release figures which might be classified and constitute an unwarranted disclosure, would the distinguished Senator from Missouri, whose competence and concern are freely conceded, not better serve the cause of security by telling the country that, despite the irretrievable loss of time in the Truman era, we have under Eisenhower made amazing strides in the missile field of which all can be proud?

Is it not pretty extreme and farfetched—and in fact a most serious reflection upon any high official of the administration—to say that a single one of them is trying or would try to lull our people into a state of complacency?

Admitting the devotion of the distinguished Senator to the cause of security, is it not possible that an equal devotion and an equal concern is cherished by many others and that, without trumpets or threats, they are quietly and steadfastly going about the business of trying to make up some of the irretrievable years which were lost by the terrible Truman failure?

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois occupied 5 minutes. Does the Senator from Missouri ask unanimous consent to have an equal amount of time?

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 4 minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator to proceed for 4 minutes? The Chair hears none, and the Senator may proceed.

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, newspaper stories reported last Monday that at an informal press conference over the weekend Vice President NIXON told newsmen, "the United States is now ahead of the Soviets in ballistic missiles" and also that "while the country is now behind Russia in the missile race it will close the gap at a fairly rapid pace."

Yesterday a news story reported that "persons who have talked with Mr. NIXON lately insist that he never made any such claim about being ahead of Russia in developing military missiles."

No friend or associate of the Vice President, however, has denied his purported statement that this country "will close the gap at a fairly rapid pace."

Mr. President, this is a subject of supreme importance to all Americans. Most of us realize that our very survival as a free people is involved.

Therefore, I now call on Mr. NIXON to give a clear statement of just what is his position, and the position of the administration.

Specifically, does the Vice President believe the United States is ahead of Russia in the long-range ballistic missile field; or does he believe Russia is ahead of the United States in this field?

Also, does he believe we are now "closing the gap at a fairly rapid pace," or that the gap continues the same, or that we are losing ground, or that there is no gap?

The Vice President raised the matter. I respectfully request that he now clarify it, for himself, for the administration, and in the national interest.

Now I address myself to the recent remarks made by the able minority leader, my friend from Illinois. He has made some charges which I should prefer to study before answering. I will do so next week.

I am sorry so many persons are answering for the Vice President—friends, associates, newspapermen, and now my friend from Illinois is answering for him.

I did not create this discussion. It was created by the Vice President, and I would hope now that he would issue his own statement.

EXECUTIONS IN CUBA

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, on last Thursday in my capacity as the chairman of the subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations which deals with Latin-American affairs, I expressed my great concern over the blood baths which were occurring in Cuba under the administration of Mr. Castro and President Urrutia.

The Washington Post this morning, Mr. President, contains the following comments:

> Castro declared the rebels were putting before the firing squads those who have killed in order to demonstrate that they could not get away with murder and crimes against the Cuban people.
> He asserted the revolutionary tribunals were trying major war criminals as speedily as possible, and said executions were ordered only for those whose death is necessary to purify the nation.
> Castro announced that a public trial of war criminals would be held shortly in Havana's Central Park.
> Foreign Minister Agramonte said of the executions:
> "If the military tribunals did not do what they are doing now, moving quickly to assure fast justice, the families of those who were murdered and tortured would take justice into their own hands and many innocent would fall with the accused."
> He estimated that 20,000 men, women, and children were murdered and tortured by Batista.
> He declared that Senator WAYNE MORSE, Democrat, of Oregon, and other friends of Cuba in the United States had misinterpreted the reasons for the executions. MORSE called the executions blood baths.
> "I would like to make it clear that the executions by military firing squads have been made under revolutionary law," Agramonte said in a press statement.
> "Each person has been accused and found guilty by military tribunals and condemned to death before military firing squads.
> "It must be pointed out for justice's sake that this penalty is at least humane compared with the barbaric treatment accorded revolutionary soldiers when captured by Batista men."
> Agramonte announced that the government of Provisional President Manuel Urrutia is about ready to complete reorganization of the Supreme Tribunal of Justice, and that it would take over from the military tribunals.
> He promised that the Supreme Tribunal would give each citizen guarantees he never had under Batista.
> "Cuba is traditionally a Catholic country," he added. "Executions by a firing squad in the eyes of the Roman Catholic Church, is not un-Christian or against moral law, provided guilty persons are allowed to confront their accusers.

Mr. President, I want to answer those statements from Mr. Castro and Mr. Agramonte. I have listened to many rationalizations from dictators for murder, but I have never listened to a more fallacious rationalization for murder than the one now coming from the lips of Mr. Castro and his Foreign Minister, Agramonte.

Mr. President, the failure on the part of the Castro and Urrutia regime to put into practice in Cuba the moral law which ought to apply in all free nations gives great concern to many of us. I think Agramonte will get his answer from the Catholic clergy in respect to his reference to the alleged policy of the Catholic Church toward executions by firing squads, because the answer is clear: There is no principle of catholicism which justifies on the ground of morality the taking of life, when the only confrontation by the accusers is the front of a rifle barrel. That has been the record of the mass murders by this new regime in Cuba since it took over.

What Castro and Agramonte ought to do is drop to their knees before their Maker and ask for forgiveness in the name of Christian principles of morality.

Mr. President, the new regime in Cuba has a great opportunity to bring justice and order to the people of Cuba, and it is no explanation to say that some hotheads might have taken the law into their own hands. One test of any regime is whether it can bring law and order to the people over which it claims to exercise jurisdiction.

This morning I took this matter up with the Secretary of State, in view of the comments that he made at his press conference yesterday. The Secretary told us that in his press conference yesterday he had tried to make it clear that he, too, hoped that freedom, liberty, justice, and law would be brought to the people of Cuba. I join in those sentiments.

Let me say to the Cuban Government that as one who has long deplored the cruelty and the murders and the injustices of the Fascist regime of Batista, so do I deplore the exercise of the same police state methods by Castro and the new Cuban regime in respect to their mass executions of numbers of the Batista regime.

I close, Mr. President, with a plea and a prayer that the new Government of Cuba will show quickly that it deserves the confidence and support of free people everywhere. I am pleased that at least there has been a temporary order for the cessation of executions. But let me say to Mr. Castro and to President Urrutia and to the Foreign Minister, "The real test is whether you bring the remaining accused persons before a bar of justice and, on the basis of a record of evidence, establish their guilt, before you impose in the name of your national sovereignty whatever penalty as a government you seek to establish as your penal system." Such a road of government by law leads to the goals of justice, public morality, liberty, and true freedom for the individual.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I take this opportunity to associate myself with the remarks of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE]. I regret the action of the new regime in Cuba. I think it is deplorable, and much to be regretted, that they have not been able, in the initial stages of the new regime, to move with greater consideration for the liberties of their people, and consideration for orderly processes of law.

THE NATIONAL ECONOMY

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, a central issue before the country and before this Congress is whether new ideas, new effort, new leadership on the part of Government, as well as business and labor, is necessary to move the great American economy ahead. I say it is. It is a shocking fact that in the last 6 years, real production for each man, woman, and child in America has gone—not up—but down.

This is a fact that should challenge every responsible American citizen: That during 6 years of massive world economic and technological progress, this great bastion of political and economic freedom has stood still.

Some dispute this. They say we are doing very well and that the policies of the present administration have proven themselves. In support of this position they point to the fact that the gross national product—the great index of all the goods and services produced in our economy—has improved from $365 billion in 1953, the first year in which this administration took office, to $439 billion during the third quarter of 1958, the most recent period for which figures are available. Mr. Harold B. Dorsey, the remarkably competent financial commentator for the Washington Post, recently made an analysis of these figures to show that far from a growing, expanding, and improving economy, these figures actually prove that the economy has gone backward since 1953—by any competent, objective measure.

Mr. Dorsey has analyzed the gross national product since 1953 by correcting the figures to put them in terms of constant dollars, that is, to eliminate the effect of inflation. In the second place, he has corrected the figures for the substantial increases in U.S. population since 1953. After these corrections are made, Mr. Dorsey's analysis shows that far from enjoying a real expansion in our economy, the American people have actually suffered a drop in gross national production since 1953, from $2,086 per person down to $2,034 in the most recent period for which figures are available, that is, the third quarter of 1958.

Mr. President, it seems to me that the only honest and fair way to appraise these figures is to recognize frankly that our economy has been standing still in the past crucial 5-year period. It has ben standing still at exactly the same time when our implacable enemy, the Soviet Union, has been enjoying an enormous increase in production and productivity. Mr. President, this is not simply an isolated view of Mr. Dorsey or of this Senator. It is a view that has been well expressed in the columns of the Nation's outstanding business newspaper, the Wall Street Journal. On Monday, December 29, in a front-page column entitled "The Outlook," the Wall Street Journal concludes:

> The picture as a whole is that of an economic system which for the fourth or fifth year in succession is going to show no growth. The same conclusion can be reached by looking at the Federal Reserve Board's index of industrial production.

Mr. President, the facts of life are that the American economy is not doing well. The fact is that we need monetary incentives, tax incentives, wholesale revision of our farm program, incentive to promote our foreign trade, and above all, the will on the part of this Government, the Congress as well as the Presidency, to move ahead at once, not 2 years from now, but at once, to provide the kind of vigorous, militant economic leadership that the needs of our people and the challenge of Soviet Russia demand.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article by Harold B. Dorsey, from the Washington Post, entitled "Restated Gross National Product Takes Bloom Off the Rose," and an article from the Wall Street Journal of Monday, December 29, entitled "The Outlook: An Appraisal of Current Trends in Business and Finance," be printed in the body of the RECORD following these remarks.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Jan. 12, 1959]

RESTATED GROSS NATIONAL PRODUCT TAKES BLOOM OFF THE ROSE

(By Harold B. Dorsey)

The December issue of the Survey of Current Business (Department of Commerce) explains that the quarterly gross national product figures will henceforth be stated not only in terms of actual current dollars, but also in terms of constant dollars, i.e., adjusted to presume there had been no price changes. This new series of figures will be a distinct addition to the business analysts' kit of tools.

One reason why this new material is interesting is because it exposes the fact that the upward trend in unit volume during the recovery from the 1953–54 recession showed a distinct flattening out immediately after the fourth quarter of 1956, whereas the current dollar figure for gross national product continued to rise to the third quarter peak of 1957. In fact, on a per capita basis the constant dollar gross national product figure started sliding off immediately after the fourth quarter 1956 peak and continued the downtrend in successive quarters in the second quarter of 1958. The latter figure wiped out all of the per capita improvement in real gross national product since 1954.

The December Survey gives the constant dollar figures for total gross national product and its major sectors by quarterly periods back through 1950, using the 1957 price level as a base. For the purposes of this discussion, and in the accompanying table, I have adjusted the figures to a 1950 price base.

Another interesting observation that may be derived from this table is the fact that the current dollar gross national product figure recorded a gain of $154.4 billion (54 percent) between 1950 and the third quarter of 1958, whereas the constant dollar figure shows an increase of only $70.5 billion (25 percent) in the same period. On a per capita basis, the improvement was only 8.3 percent on the constant dollar basis.

These facts deserve serious consideration from several different points of view. It probably is not appreciated by the average person that over half of the improvement in the dollar measurements of the economy's total activity in the past 8 years has been due to higher prices; this proportion of the dollar increase added nothing to public welfare in terms of units of goods and services made available for consumption. And the larger part of the real improvement in the total can be ascribed to the fact that an increasing population naturally requires an increase in the units of available goods and services—even if we are merely to sustain a flat level in the standard of living.

Furthermore, whereas the constant dollar figure for total gross national product increased 25 percent between 1950 and the third quarter of 1951, the Government sector rose 74 percent in the same period, exposing the fact that an increasing proportion of the economy's total productive effort was being absorbed by the Federal, State, and local governments, leaving a lesser proportion of that effort for non-Government use.

At this juncture it is especially important to gain an understanding of the fallacious interpretations that are popularly derived from the dollar business measurements during a period of rising commodity prices. The present evidence suggests that the inflationary wage price may well be forced into an accelerating phase about 6 months hence. This would then inflate the dollar business measurements and make it difficult to see that rising prices were retarding sound growth in unit volume, a repetition of the experience of 1956–57 when the phenomenon led up to the 1957–58 recession.

As matters now stand, the repetition of that pattern seems to be a better than even prospect. To prevent it, we would have to see the elimination of Federal, State, and local government deficit spending, the restraining of wage increases to those justified by productivity improvement, and the restraining of non-Government debt expansion to proportions justified by normal economic growth.

For reasons explained in my earlier columns, there does not seem to be much likelihood that any of these anti-inflationary actions will materialize as we go through the current year. It does not seem likely that the proportion of the economy's productive effort now being absorbed by Government spending will be reduced to make room for the anticipated further recovery in consumer expenditures for durable goods, for a return to inventory accumulation, and for a recovery later on in business capital expenditures. The consequence, then, seems bound to be an acceleration of the wage-price spiral approximately 6 months hence.

THE OUTLOOK: APPRAISAL OF CURRENT TRENDS IN BUSINESS AND FINANCE

(By George Shea)

The outstanding feature of forecasts now being made for 1959 in most industries is that they do not point to new highs, nor to a demand or production level likely to engage full capacity. And the outstanding fact about the yearend business situation is that, in spite of much talk about inflation, commodity prices are either steady or down.

The annual roundup of the Department of Commerce on prospects for the Nation's industries was printed in this newspaper Friday and, taking it together with other governmental and private forecasts, most industries look for gains, but few are pressing up toward new records. Those which are include paperboard cartons, construction of all kinds, and scientific instruments and electronics.

In construction and electronics only special divisions are pointing to new highs. Public construction, with the accent on highways, will be up while private construction is expected to slip a bit. Missile and space electronic products will reach records, but electric appliance demand, while expected to come back from this year's slump, may not quite reach the 1957 level, which in turn was only the third best on record—1955's having been the best.

The same rather conservative general statement can be made with regard to prospective demand in relation to capacities. Paperboard, special electronics, and scientific instruments are being produced at or close to capacity, but the capacities of most industries substantially exceed projected 1959 demand and output. The top forecast for steel is 115 million tons, close to the 1955 record but far below the 146 million tons capacity. The cheeriest guess for autos is 5.5 million cars, whereas almost 8 million were made in 1955.

The picture as a whole is that of an economic system which for the fourth or fifth year in succession is going to show no growth. The same conclusion can be reached by looking at the Federal Reserve Board's index of industrial production. For 1955, it was 139 percent of the 1947–49 average, and for this year it has been less than that. Late in 1955, the index was above 140, which is where it is now. In both 1956 and 1957 the index averaged 143, and if present forecasts turn out right it won't be much more in 1959.

In regard to prices a similar observation can be made. Wholesale commodity prices and retail prices are, it is true, at record highs according to their monthly indexes. But since 1955 they are up less than 10 percent, and this year, in spite of the $12 billion Federal deficit and the many inflation warnings issued in recent months, the consumer index is up less than 2 percent and the wholesale index less than 1 percent from December 1957.

Furthermore, prices of raw materials, which don't include any large element of labor, are down, not up. The Dow, Jones indexes of spot commodities and of futures are finishing the year at their lowest levels since before the Korean war started in 1950.

The same trend can be observed in the world at large. Reuter's index of United Kingdom prices, which represents mostly raw materials with world markets, is at its lowest level in years. The latest United Nations index of basic world commodity prices is at 97 percent of the 1953 average, below every year back to 1950, while for manufactured goods it is 107 against 108 in the first 1958 quarter (and 86 in 1950). Thus the real trend of underlying commodity prices has been down, and it is other costs, principally for labor, which have gone up and driven up the more commonly watched indexes.

Nor has this situation failed to be reflected in world trade. Not only United States exports are down this year. Total exports of the rest of the world in the first half of 1958 were down $1.7 billion from the like half of 1957, about the same as the decline in U.S. exports, if in both cases the special influence of Suez-crisis oil shipments is taken out of the figures.

These facts, together with industrial production figures available for the principal industrial countries outside the United States, show that the huge postwar boom of 1948–57 has leveled off in the non-Communist world. Perhaps the boom is merely taking a rest before surging ahead again, as may be the promise in Europe if the weekend's currency reforms achieve their aims. Or perhaps a major turn to a period of slowdown is under way. Which of these is taking place we won't know until more evidence is available.

Meantime, one factor in the U.S. outlook can be analyzed to a tentative conclusion. It has to do with the trend in the cost of borrowing money. At present there seems to be a widespread opinion that money is going to become more costly next year. Yet a different prospect emerges from consideration of the projections for business cited at the top of this column.

If the gains in most industries are going to be modest, if prices are relatively steady, and if capital spending merely holds at the rate of recent months (there being no need for any more than that with capacity so generally ample), no substantial rise in the demand for money need be expected. At the same time, there may be some gain in the supply of funds generated by the economic system. Corporate profits will be almost surely at a higher rate than this year, and the depreciation reserves set aside by business will continue to grow as they have since 1954. Individual savings are accumulating at a record rate.

Equally wide, of course, is the expectation that business will rise mildly next year. If 1959 business proves to be much better than expected, interest costs and yields might go up. But it seems improbable that the expectations of only mild business improvement and of a strong rise in interest rates will both prove right.

Indeed, the belief that interest rates will rise has had a noticeable effect. For instance, yields on U.S. Government bonds have risen to or near the highs of recent years. In a way, therefore, much if not all of the expected rise in interest costs may already have taken place.

RURAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, in the Washington Post of January 11, 1959, there appeared an article by Under Secretary of Agriculture True D. Morse describing what he termed "the new rural America." I commend to the attention of my colleagues this lucid and forward-looking statement which summarizes the goals toward which we must work in order to gain long-term prosperity in the Nation's agricultural areas.

Mr. Morse observes that through the new rural development program and similar work, the Federal Government is encouraging improvement of opportunity for rural people. A tremendous amount of planning, research, and community improvement is going into this program in some 30 States all over the Nation. The program, which has not received the full recognition it deserves, can help strengthen the economies of our small towns and rural areas generally. All of us need to be aware of this important pioneering effort to meet the needs of rural people in a changing world.

I ask unanimous consent that this short article be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COUNTRY LIVING: ON A NEW RURAL AMERICA, THE SUN IS REALLY RISING

(By True D. Morse, Under Secretary of Agriculture)

I enjoyed reading Aubrey Graves' recent article describing the great values and benefits of farm living. The article brought back many happy memories of the years spent on the farm, as a boy growing up and as a farm operator and manager. I agree completely with the squire that the family farm is "a molder of character and a rich heritage" and should be strengthened as a vital contribution to the Nation's life.

However, I most certainly don't agree that the family farm is dying out. True, the number of families living on farms is growing less in proportion to total population, and farm life is more romantic than in days gone by. We live in a world of change and this is particularly true of agriculture.

However, full-time family farmers still dominate American agriculture. Today, as 25 years ago, some 95 percent of all our farms are family operated. Using modern machinery, fertilizers, and insecticides, and a wide range of skills, the individual farm family can and does operate a larger farm unit with increased efficiency, higher production, and better all-round living than ever before.

Just as important, many of the smaller agricultural units which provided "country living" but little income in the old days, now furnish pleasant farm homesteads for thousands of American families whose income is earned mainly in off-farm work, thanks to growing industrialization and business expansion in rural areas.

We've long recognized and supported the benefits of urban renewal. But equal recognition has not been given the grassroots rural renewal of the past decade, which is having a tremendous impact on the Nation's economic and social well-being.

Rural renewal takes the form of larger, more efficient family farms; towns with expanding industry for farm people to commute to; long-term conservation and reforestation; new rural schools providing all the educational benefits of city schools; improved roads and markets.

Through such programs as the rural development program, now going forward in some 250 counties all across the Nation, we are encouraging State governments and private interests to speed up this long-range trend toward the new rural America.

Therefore, many would question the title, "Setting Sun Dimly Lights the Dying Family Farm." The sun may be setting on the submarginal and marginal farm, which was the root of so much rural poverty in the past. But the sun is rising on a new rural America where there will be ample country living, and along with it adequate income and opportunities for rural people.

DR. FELIX J. UNDERWOOD, OF MISSISSIPPI

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, Mississippi and the Nation have lost a great man in the passing of Dr. Felix J. Underwood at his desk last Friday. The cause of public health has lost a champion, benefactor, and friend. We mourn his passing.

Only last June, after 41 years of unselfish service to the people of Mississippi and the cause of public health, Dr. Underwood retired from his post as executive officer of the Mississippi State Board of Health. Results of his valuable work have long been felt throughout our Nation and the world. His long fight against malaria, diphtheria, typhoid and other diseases won him national acclaim as the man "who saved a million lives," and directed national attention to public health work in Mississippi. During his tenure, maternal deaths were reduced from more than 7 per 1,000 live births to slightly more than 1. Malaria formerly claimed more than 1,000 lives annually in Mississippi, now less than 1 a decade. Dr. Underwood assisted in developing Mississippi's tuberculosis sanitarium, and in 30 years saw the number of deaths from tuberculosis in our State reduced from 4,000 a year to only rare cases.

Mr. President, Dr. Underwood was not interested in financial reward. During the course of the years, he received many lucrative offers from other States and foundations, and he could have had a large private practice. This great man dedicated his life to service for humanity. Choosing to remain in public health work, here are his own words regarding his decision:

As a private physician, I can never care for more than two or three thousand people. As a public health physician, I can care for millions.

This was the philosophy which guided the long hours in his dedicated and unyielding battle against disease. He made Mississippi's public health service one of the finest in the Nation. Twice he was the recipient of the Lasker Award for outstanding achievement in the field of public health.

Shattering a longstanding precedent, more than 2 years prior to his death, the State of Mississippi named its new State health department building in honor of Dr. Underwood. Now almost ready for occupancy, this building will be a continuing monument in brick and stone to his great work. But progress in the field of public health is his real monument.

During his long career, Dr. Underwood served as president of the Mississippi State Medical Association, the Southern Medical Association, the State and Provincial Health Authorities, as well as president of the American Public Health Association.

In December, United Press International, a worldwide news service, named Dr. Underwood Mississippi's man for the year. Just 2 days before his death, he was selected to receive one of three awards from the University of Mississippi for distinguished service to our State.

His last public service, performed only moments before his death, was the signing of his personal check for his contribution to this year's March of Dimes.

We mourn his passing. But all who are familiar with Dr. Underwood's record of service are grateful for his constructive and far-reaching achievements. The world will long benefit from his rich and useful life.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD three editorials relative to Dr. Underwood, published in leading newspapers of Mississippi.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Jackson (Miss.) Clarion Ledger, Jan. 1, 1959]

DR. UNDERWOOD SERVED STATE AT A SACRIFICE

Dr. Felix J. Underwood, whose death Friday ended the most brilliant medical career in modern annals of the State, served the people of this Commonwealth at a sacrifice.

For many of his early years, he bore a portion of his own expenses when appropriations for the office did not permit a number of activities he felt were of such huge benefit as to merit his contributing that to the welfare of the State.

Often during his career he received offers from other States, from the Federal Public Health Service and from several foundations to leave Mississippi and take more lucrative positions. Naturally, he could have made more money in private practice than the State ever paid him.

And finally, in the crowning years of his life, he steadfastly declined to permit his salary to be increased, and as his career drew to a close, his salary as chief executive officer of the State board of health was actually lower than some of those of his associates.

[From the Jackson (Miss.) State Times, Jan. 10, 1959]

STATE'S UNSELFISH BENEFACTOR

(A personal testimonial by Oliver Emmerich)

The death of Dr. Felix J. Underwood brings into focus a career which touched every family in Mississippi's 82 counties and a life which was lived abundantly.

When Dr. Underwood became executive head of Mississippi's State Board of Health, thousands of our people moped about the State like zombies, listless and half alive, victims of malaria. Our infant mortality rate was tragically high. Death from typhoid was as routine as the seasons. Little children were strangled by diphtheria. Tuberculosis was the major killer. Our people were backward and poor as the result of diseases and distress.

It is no wonder that Dr. Underwood was referred to as the man who had saved a million lives. The life expectancy of our people—you and I—was lengthened. And our standard of health lifted as a result of his dedication and devotion.

Some men are honored after death. Dr. Underwood lived to see the fruition of his dreams. He was honored while yet alive, was loved and appreciated by the people he served, and was not a prophet without honor among his own people. He lived a wonderful life and was recognized by his professional associates both nationally and internationally. Representatives of medical societies and public health organizations of many foreign countries came to Mississippi to observe his work. A few months ago his friends honored him with a banquet on the occasion of his retirement. On the same day he was runner-up for America's man of the year in medicine. Just this week he was named as one of three of Mississippi's outstanding men of our State—a man of the year of 1958. And now suddenly from the midst of glory, he is swallowed up in victory.

Dr. Underwood knew the meaning of faith, the essence of kindness, the magnificence of loyalty and with it all he was gentle. Indeed, this is the substance of greatness. He loved his many friends—and we loved him.

No epitaph need be inscribed on a tombstone for him. It is already recorded in the communicable diseases statistics of a sick people made well. He was our unselfish benefactor.

[From the Memphis Commercial Appeal, Jan. 11, 1959]

DR. FELIX J. UNDERWOOD

On the roster of those who have rendered invaluable service to the people of Mississippi in particular and the Nation in general the name of Dr. Felix J. Underwood will stand very high. When he retired last June as executive officer of the State board of health he had held that post for 34 years and had won the right to be called the man who saved a million lives.

Dr. Underwood had battled unceasingly against ailments such as typhoid, malaria, and diphtheria until their ravages among the people of Mississippi had been reduced to a minimum. He was of great aid to the late Dr. Henry Boswell in developing Mississippi's highly effective campaign against tuberculosis. In fact, anything that affected the public health was his concern so that he became outstanding in that field.

In addition to his immediate duties Dr. Underwood worked with professional organizations and had been president of State, regional and national associations. He was physician to a nation, that is to say.

It is good to know that United Press International newspaper, radio and television editors had named Dr. Underwood Mississippi's man of the year for 1958 last month. He had also been selected to receive the University of Mississippi's "Missy" Award for Distinguished Service.

Dr. Underwood so employed his talents and energies that he left the world a far better place than it would have been without him and the fact is an epitaph among the finest.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. STENNIS. I yield.

Mr. HILL. I join with the distinguished Senator from Mississippi in the tribute he has paid Dr. Underwood. I deeply regret Dr. Underwood's death. I knew him well. I had the opportunity to observe closely his fine work and his outstanding services. There was no abler public health officer in the United States, and there was no more dedicated public servant.

There was in the soul of Felix Underwood the gospel of humanity and of the Master himself.

Mr. STENNIS. I thank the Senator from Alabama for his very fine tribute to Dr. Underwood.

PROPOSED INDEPENDENT STATUS OF RURAL ELECTRIFICATION ADMINISTRATION

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I noted with approval the introduction, on January 9, by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. CURTIS] and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], of the bill (S. 75) to restore to independent status the Rural Electrification Administration.

During the adjournment of Congress, I have been working on proposed legislation along a similar line. I entirely approve of S. 75 as it has been introduced by the Senator from Nebraska and the Senator from Georgia. I think it is a good forward step. Since it has been referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, of which I am a member, I expect to support the bill in committee as well as on the floor of the Senate.

Originally, REA was an independent agency. It has been shunted into and out of the Department of Agriculture with more or less restrictions and restraints obtainable by the authority of the Secretary of Agriculture. I think the hearings which were held by the Committee on Government Operations last year clearly demonstrate the desirability of making the Rural Electrification Administration once again an independent agency.

The REA has made tremendous progress. I think it very well exemplifies the philosophy of government enunciated by Abraham Lincoln, whose birthday we shall celebrate next month. Lincoln at one time said:

The legitimate object of government is to do for a community of people whatever they need to have done, but cannot do at all, or cannot do so well for themselves, in their separate and individual capacities. In all that the people can individually do as well for themselves, government ought not to interfere.

It is quite obvious that the electrification of rural America fits precisely that criterion of good government, as, I might add, does the Rural Telephone Administration—RTA—which provides in the field of communication what REA has provided for rural people in terms of electrification.

Senate bill 75 should be acted on early in this session of Congress. I shall do all I can to expedite action in the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to which the bill has been referred.

In 1939, REA was placed under the general direction and supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture as a result of the reorganization plan of the President. The further transfer of REA operations to the control of the Secretary of Agriculture was made in 1953, under Reorganization Plan No. 2. The hearings before the Committee on Government Operations last year convinced me of the wisdom of the proposed legislation offered by the Senator from Nebraska and the Senator from Georgia.

In the years ahead rural electrification can move forward to great achievement, with its aims and direction unhampered, by being given the status of an independent agency. S. 75 will restore, once for all, and with finality, the independent status of the Rural Electrification Administration.

In endorsing this proposal, I believe it is incumbent that acknowledgment be made of the outstanding performance of the present REA Administrator, David A. Hammil. He has proved to be an able leader, and the passage of S. 75 will result in greater achievement by this dedicated public servant.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL subsequently said: Mr. President, on January 9 I was not privileged to be on the Senate floor, being engaged in other matters, when the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. CURTIS] spoke on the restoration of the Rural Electrification Administration as an independent agency. I note the distinguished Senator from Nebraska [Mr. CURTIS] was joined by the distinguished senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] with respect to that proposed legislation.

Mr. President, I have noted the remarks of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. CURTIS] at the time he introduced S. 75, which has now been referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. I wholeheartedly subscribe to the position taken by the distinguished Senators who joined in the sponsorship of the proposed legislation. The position that the REA should be an independent agency, with all the powers and duties originally intended, seems to be sound and practical.

As a member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, I shall support the proposed legislation, in committee as well as on the floor of the Senate. I think it is a decided step forward. I think it should have been done quite a while ago. Even though it is coming at this late time, I think it is a great step forward, so far as concerns the rural electrification program and what it was intended to do.

THE PRESIDENT'S ADDRESS ON THE STATE OF THE UNION

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I listened last week, for the third time, to a state of the Union address before a joint session of the Congress by the President of the United States. The Constitution which gives to the President the duty to give to the Congress information of the state of the Union, creates a powerful office, central to our system of government. World events in 170 years, and particularly in the last four decades, have made the Office of the President and the functions of the Presidency the most important in the world.

Yet, many of us who heard last week's message came away troubled.

Two distinguished columnists expressed anxieties, similar to my own, in the Washington Post of January 13. In one article, Marquis Childs treats with what he feels about the state of the President. In the other, Walter Lippmann treats of what he believes the message shows of the state of the Presidency.

Both articles are highly provocative, and worthy of the sober attention of the Congress and the Nation. I ask unanimous consent that they be included in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IS EISENHOWER BORED OR TIRED?

(By Marquis Childs)

At midnight on January 19 an important anniversary will have passed. That date marks the official end of the first half of President Eisenhower's second term in the White House.

Under the 22d amendment to the Constitution, adopted in reprisal for Franklin Roosevelt's fourth-term election, if the President had vacated the office prior to that date his successor could have been reelected to only one full term. For the Republican Party and for Vice President NIXON in particular this is a day to be ringed on the calendar.

While all lame-duck Presidents under the American system of fixed terms of office have been under a serious handicap, few have found themselves in the situation confronting Mr. Eisenhower. As a result of the crushing defeat of last November his party has been reduced to a small fraction in the Senate and the House.

These fractions are themselves divided and the President's support has dwindled among both conservative and liberal Republicans. The state of the Union message was largely a reiteration of the budget-balancing theme, with the addition of still another commission to tell us where we are to go.

With a budgetary deficit of $12 billion in the current fiscal year the administration has proclaimed a balanced budget for next year. The likelihood, however, is for another deficit, perhaps as high as $9 billion. And while the political trick will be to put the blame on the Democrats, the party in power in the executive branch will have to take the consequences.

Despite the continuous barrage of high-powered publicity, sober and acknowledgable critics of the administration's defense policy are saying that the missile lag will shortly leave this country in a precarious condition. The delicate balance of terror, as it has been aptly called, will tip increasingly against the security of the United States.

But, in the view of those profoundly concerned over the conduct of the Presidency and the fate of the Nation in the coming 2 critical years, these external troubles are not so serious as the fact of the President's increasing isolation. This is the fundamental complaint of the activist group in the Cabinet who believe it is essential to do something more than demand economy and a balanced budget.

They see the President as more and more shut away from the political crosscurrents that shape events and determine the possible from the impossible in politics and government. His intimates, a half dozen men with whom he plays golf and bridge, try to avoid any mention of current problems when they are with him.

Somewhat the same attitude prevails among members of the White House staff who are so dedicated that they discount all criticism which, in any event, rarely reaches the President's ears. They provide, in short, a layer of insulation for an Executive in the most demanding office in the world.

Even with an earnest desire to keep open the channels of free exchange with the world outside the prisoner in the White House has an inevitable struggle. For a President who is bored or indifferent or simply tired it is hopeless.

The degree to which those immediately around the President discount the mounting chorus of criticism is extraordinary. This has been coming of late from loyal Republicans with a growing concern over the drift of events. It is put down either to ignorance or prejudice—"Oh, he's just a pinko," is commonly heard. Even the disaster of the election is written off as a failure to sell the virtues of the administration; the salesmen in the field did a poor job.

In a Cabinet meeting some months ago a Cabinet member referred to the adverse report of a columnist frequently critical of the administration. The color in the President's face deepened and he said with an edge to his voice, "Well, if you've got time to read that stuff you must not have much to do."

Those close to him say that today he loses his temper far less frequently. He simply refuses to be engaged. The impression is of a man serving out a sentence with the patience and stoicism he can muster.

But the world does not stand still and the Presidency is at the heart of the American system. This is the somber reflection of those in the official family looking ahead to the last 2 years.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE

(By Walter Lippmann)

Granted that the President's first message to Congress is bound to be rather general in character, what the President had to say on Friday throws very little light indeed on the state of the Union. He said in effect that we are "ceaselessly challenged," and that in meeting this challenge all that we can afford to do, without raising taxes, is all that we need to do.

This is a remarkable coincidence—that we are able to meet so great a challenge without any additional effort and sacrifice during the coming fiscal year, and that in the following year we may be able to relax and to reduce taxes. We are confronted, said Mr. Eisenhower, with a question which is as old as history, whether a government based upon liberty can endure when it is ceaselessly challenged by a dictatorship with growing economic and military power. And what is the answer to this question which is as old as history? It is that we can indeed endure by doing no more than we are doing now.

But just what is the use of asking this tremendous question about whether we can endure if the answer is that we are already doing all that is necessary? The explanation, I am afraid, is that the President is trying to ride two horses at once—to be hard when he talks to Moscow and soft when he talks of our own people. We are to defy the challenge abroad and are to reduce taxes at home.

This does not sound as if the President expected the Nation to take the ceaseless challenge very seriously. For if it is true, as in fact it is, that the Soviet Union is challenging us with an economic and military power of great and growing strength, how is it conceivable that we can look forward to a tax reduction just before the coming national presidential election? This is the kind of softness and self-indulgence which is as old as history, and again and again in history has meant the ruin of great states.

To be hard on the outside and soft on the inside is to invite trouble. For this is a changing world in which the power and the influence of the challenger are growing. We cannot long hope to succeed in meeting this challenge by a policy of standing pat in all things—on all of our positions abroad and on our efforts at home.

The right position is that of Churchill's when he said "we arm to parley." We should arm more strongly and we should negotiate more readily. We should be not inflexible but we should be tough, remembering that what is inflexible is usually brittle.

NEW WATER RESOURCES DEVELOPMENT PLAN

Mr. ENGLE. Mr. President, on behalf of my colleague, the senior Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL], and myself, I introduced on January 9 a bill, S. 13, to provide for Federal assistance in the development of irrigation in connection with non-Federal municipal and industrial water projects, and for other purposes.

Water enough for the needs of its growing population is a dominant issue in California. The impasse on our water problems, I believe, stems from trying to divide too little water among too many people. I am advancing a proposal which strikes at the real problem—the financing of additional water development. This proposal is embodied in the proposed legislation I introduced. It provides for Federal participation in State and local projects where the major cost is for development of municipal and industrial water. This bill is of significance to the Eastern and Southern States, as well as to the West, in according Federal recognition to the fact that irrigation also is required and is now rather extensively practiced on a small scale in many portions of the East and South. Such recognition is long overdue. The bill would apply the basic principles of national reclamation to all parts of the Nation, and would encourage the planning and construction of water-resource developments on a multipurpose and comprehensive basis.

The Federal Government at the present time constructs projects primarily for irrigation, through the Bureau of Reclamation and under the reclamation law. In addition, under the small-projects legislation, of which I am the author, the Federal Government advances interest-free money to public agencies for the construction of small irrigation projects costing not in excess of $10 million. The Watershed Protection Act, through the Department of Agriculture, makes provision for Federal grants and loans for the construction of small upstream conservation projects. With reference to flood control, the Federal Government has historically built on a nonreimbursable basis projects primarily dedicated to flood control.

There is one obvious gap: no provision exists in present Federal law for the Federal Government's participation in projects primarily for the development of industrial and municipal water, which is a field of growing importance in all areas of our Nation. My proposed legislation would supplement existing law and, as I indicated before, would have nationwide applicability. In California, I believe it would be the basis for the establishment of a new Federal-State relationship. I would venture the guess that the major undeveloped water projects in California will be mainly for industrial and municipal water, rather than for irrigation and flood control.

Briefly, my proposed legislation contains the following provisions:

First, that the Federal Government contribute to such projects, on a nonreimbursable basis, an amount equal to the portion of the project allocated to flood control benefits. This is a recognition of the traditional responsibility of the Federal Government for flood control, and follows the precedent established in the omnibus Rivers and Harbors Act of the last Congress, which provides for Federal contribution for the flood control benefits from Oroville Dam, on the Feather River project. Congress has therefore indicated that this is an acceptable principle for Federal-State cooperation in the building of multiple-purpose projects.

Second, that the Federal Government provide a non-interest-bearing loan for the amount of the project cost allocated to irrigation. This procedure would apply the principles of the 50-year-old reclamation law under which non-interest-bearing money is provided by the Federal Government for the development of irrigation projects. It is an expansion of the principle laid down in the small-projects legislation, but of course in this instance is limited to multiple-purpose projects primarily for industrial and municipal water, where irrigation water is developed incidental to the main purpose. It is my feeling that Congress would not approve the advance of non-interest-bearing money for construction by the State of a large project primarily for irrigation, but would insist that such a project be built under the present reclamation law if it is to be financed by the Federal Government. I think it important that the traditional function of the Federal Government in building projects under the reclamation law not be invaded. However, I believe there is justification for Congress to authorize a non-interest-bearing loan to a State for incidental irrigation features of a major project primarily built for industrial and municipal water.

Third, the Federal Government will require a repayment contract covering the loan, and also a contract under which the State will agree that the project shall be managed in such a fashion as to produce the benefits for which the Federal contribution is made. This follows the present provision for the Federal contribution for the flood-control benefits on the Oroville Dam. As to irrigation, Congress, I am sure, would require that the non-interest-bearing loan for irrigation be subject to the general provisions of reclamation law, or similar provisions.

I am especially anxious that this principle be set in motion to develop new water supplies in California. Southern California interests understandably do not want to buy a pig in a poke—that is, contribute their money to the construction of northern California projects without assurance that southern California will receive benefits from such development. Northern California, on the other hand, does not want to promise water deliveries south of the Tehachapis, which may in the future literally leave northern California high and dry. The importance of this proposal and the proposed legislation I have introduced is that it strikes at the real problem, which is the financing of additional water development, thereby making sufficient water available to meet all foreseeable needs in both northern California and southern California.

ESTABLISHMENT OF COAL RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT COMMISSION

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, on January 10, 1959, the distinguished minority leader [Mr. DIRKSEN] presented to this body S. 49, a bill to establish a Coal Research and Development Commission to encourage and stimulate the production and conservation of coal in the United States. Along with the able junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. BYRD] and Senators from other coal-producing States, I have joined as a sponsor of that measure.

On January 12 the able senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER], who also is a sponsor of S. 49, made appropriate remarks in reference to this bill introduced by the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN]. I associate myself with those remarks, printed on page 496 of the RECORD for that date.

I desire at this time to ask unanimous consent to have placed in the RECORD at this point in my observations portions of a press release issued by my colleague, the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. BYRD] and myself in reference to the introduction and the purposes of S. 49.

There being no objection, the press release was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In a joint statement relating to the coal research and development bill introduced in the Senate today by Senator DIRKSEN, Republican of Illinois, with Senators JENNINGS

RANDOLPH and ROBERT C. BYRD, both Democrats, of West Virginia, as cosponsors, the two West Virginia Senators said this measure is approximately the same as legislation passed by the Senate during the 2d session of the 85th Congress, but not acted upon by the House. Noting its strong bipartisan sponsorship and support in the Senate this session, the Senators from West Virginia predicted the bill will receive prompt consideration by the Senate Interior and Insular Affairs Committee and will be passed by the Senate.

In fact, said Senators BYRD and RANDOLPH, "We are most hopeful that it will be passed by both the Senate and the House early in this session of Congress." They commented further that similar bills already have been introduced in the House where they have the unanimous backing of the West Virginia delegation on that side of Capitol Hill.

The Randolph-Byrd joint statement added that, "This measure is intended to encourage and stimulate the production, conservation, and additional uses of coal in the United States through research and development by creating a Coal Research and Development Commission.

"It is the first of several items of legislation we propose to introduce or cosponsor as early as possible during the present session to improve the prospect for the return of a strong, healthy, coal-mining industry which is so essential to the economic welfare and security of the United States and so vitally important to West Virginia.

"The U.S. Senate, in passing the coal-research bill last year, agreed that the Nation's coal industry is not strong and healthy by any means, being an industry that has long been economically ill and highly vulnerable to competitive fuels.

"The benefits which would accrue from activities of the proposed Coal Research and Development Commission would do much to improve and strengthen an impoverished industry.

"Although some localized coal-mining sectors have been overworked—especially in some communities of West Virginia—the Nation's and West Virginia's coal resources generally represent a vast storehouse of mineral wealth that has barely been tapped. These resources, if properly developed and conserved, should serve the Nation for several centuries to come.

"There is unquestioned need that West Virginia's coal-producing industry be revitalized and stimulated as rapidly as possible to increase coal marketing and rail transportation, thereby helping to overcome the vast amount of chronic unemployment which has persisted too long in the coalfields and railroad communities."

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, I also wish to say that on last evening, in reading the Washington Evening Star, January 13, 1959, an intensely interesting article came to my attention—the headline being: "Drug Called 10 Times Better Than Morphine."

The article notes that the drug, known as NIH 7519, is not derived from opium but is made of derivatives of coal tar.

Coal tar, of course, is a derivative of one of our great bounties—coal.

I ask unanimous consent that the article be inserted at this point in the remarks I am making.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DRUG CALLED 10 TIMES BETTER THAN MORPHINE

A new pain-killing drug, 10 times more powerful than morphine and 50 times greater than codeine, was announced today by the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare.

HEW Secretary Flemming termed the drug, developed by the National Institutes of Health, "an exciting breakthrough" and "one of the most satisfying announcements I have ever made."

The drug, known as NIH 7519, is not derived from opium but is made of derivatives of coal tar.

Aside from tremendous pain-killing power, the drug is believed to be less addicting than those derived from opium and causes less respiratory depression.

Dr. Flemming declared the drug is produced synthetically, a fact that appears to be of special importance at this time, for I understand there is an acute worldwide shortage of opium available for medicinal purposes.

Dr. Everette L. May and Dr. Nathan B. Eddy, of the National Institute of Arthritis and Metabolic Diseases, developed the new compound. The two scientists reported it yesterday to a closed-door session of the Committee on Drug Addiction and Narcotics of the National Research Council.

Secretary Flemming noted that scientists for years have been trying to separate the pain-relieving and the addicting characteristics found in substances with potency as great or greater than morphine.

Although a number of pain-killing drugs have been produced, it has been found that in general the greater the pain-killing power, the greater the addiction and other harmful effects.

NIH 7519, he said, "gives preliminary promise that a partial separation of the analgesic and addicting properties may have been achieved." He said further tests are necessary to see exactly how addicting the drug is.

Already the drug has been tested on some 200 clinic patients over the country.

The Secretary said patent applications have been filed in the names of Dr. May and Dr. Eddy who in turn assigned their rights to the Government. This means that after final tests are made, any authorized pharmaceutical manufacturer may obtain a license to produce it.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, the exciting breakthrough in medical science, as typified by the discovery of the new drug, was an accomplishment of Government research.
